SPORTS

Women's soccer triumphs, 2-1, over Virginia

"I wasn't as nervous as I thought I'd be," Curtis said. "But in the first 10 minutes or so, I was kind of worried."

The Cavaliers began the game in control like they did in the season opener, having good possessions and getting good shots on Curtis. But UMass regrouped on defense and eventually turned the tide with a pair of corner kicks.

On the first corner, Sue Gaudette took a ball from a short inbound pass and drove it toward the net. UVA midfielder Vicki Sidorenko headed the ball out, but Margie Jaede picked up the loose ball and drove a shot which was just wide of the net.

The pressure from the Reds forced Virginia assistant coach Bill Wilkins into a tactical lineup change, removing forward Tracy DiMillio and bringing in defensive back Monica McTeague.

It seemed like the Reds would play well enough to open up the lead, but have to settle for a tie at the half as always. But coach Jim Rudy made the first of many good substitutions, inserting sophomore Woodside at left midfield. The dividends would pay off at a timely point in the game, as she scored the go-ahead goal with a mere 18 seconds left in the first half, a back-breaker for the Cavaliers.

Woodside picked up a ball at midfield and carried it into the left side of the box. Bouncing off a defender, she switched the ball to her left foot and let one go that found the right side of the net past Virginia goalie Andrea Rippe.

"She's been doing that all year," said Rudy. "She comes off the bench better than she starts."

Even more amazing was that Woodside was a medical question mark coming into the game with a sore foot. But she was given the OK to play after Saturday's practice and came up big.

Woodside was one of several injured players who played quite well yesterday for UMass. Junior Kim Montgomery overcame a badly swollen right knee and did a terrific job at sweeper.

"I was confident with Kim in the back. She did a nice job directing our backs," Curtis said.

Neither team dominated the second half until, with 28 minutes left, UMass almost caught a break with Eynard pressuring Rippe. That was to foreshadow the second goal for the Reds five minutes later.

Colette Bowler started the play by leading Leanne Swartz down the right side with a pass. Swartz ran the ball down on the end line with her quickness and produced a tough angle shot on Rippe. After making the initial stop, Rippe couldn't control the rebound and Eynard was in the middle to put the ball away and make it 2-0 with 22:58 left in the game.

Immediately after Eynard's goal, Rudy jumped off the bench and yelled, "Remember NC State." In that game, UMass took a 2-0 lead in the second half before the Wolfpack rallied to produce a 2-2 tie. Rudy had a premonition that, like the NC State contest, this game was far from over.

And he couldn't have been more right. The Minutewomen still held the seemingly comfortable two-goal edge late in the game. However, inside the last five minutes Andrea Rubio was fouled in the box by Bowler, which appeared to be incidental contact, but the referee awarded Virginia a penalty kick.

Andrea Cromwell took the kick, setting up like a field goal kicker and then coming in straight on. Curtis correctly guessed that the shot would go to the right, but Cromwell's shot was well-placed and found the net to put the Cavaliers on the board with 4:19 to play.

Given a new life, Virginia put on a flurry in the final minutes in an effort to tie the game. But Curtis and the defense averted any more chances and the Reds were victorious.

Tourney notes: In other first-round action this weekend, the University of Hartford stunned the University of Connecticut, 3-2 in overtime Saturday in Storrs, Conn.

Jeanne Dergrance broke a 3-3 deadlock to send the Hawks off for a date with top-ranked and undefeated North Carolina.

The other games saw North Carolina State beat George Mason, 3-0 while California-Santa Barbara knocked off Wisconsin, 1-0.

Field hockey falls to Penn State at A-10s

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — It is seldom that you will see University of Massachusetts field hockey coach Pam Hixon get as mad as she did yesterday at the Atlantic 10 Championships at Rutgers University.

The Minutewomen had advanced to the final game after beating Temple, 3-1 on Saturday, and were engaged in a battle with Penn State, a team which had beaten UMass, 1-0 earlier in the season.

But a pass by Eleanor Stone was deflected off the leg of a Penn State player and about five feet into the air in front of the eyes of Penn State forward Chelle Frates. Frates batted the ball past Phillipa Scott, who did not have much of a chance.

The Lady Lions won the game, 1-0, and Frates was awarded tournament MVP.

"It was unfortunate that we lost the game on that kind of a goal," Hixon said. "It was a terrible call. I was mad at the call, I definitely wanted a card. I thought [the UMass players] got screwed. So I had to do something to show that I was right there with them, and I was not going to take it lying down."

The official obliged Hixon, stopping the game with 16:34 left in the first half to issue a green card. But her ploy worked.

Following the goal UMass took over the game. The Minutewomen outshot the Lady Lions, 17-12, and drew nine penalty corners as opposed to five for Penn State.

But Penn goalie Michele Brennan made 11 saves and UMass just could not find a way to capitalize on numerous scoring opportunities.

"We played great," Hixon said. "I think this was one of our best performances on turf. We had a lot of intensity, a lot of enthusiasm. We just couldn't put the ball in the net, and I can't even count the number of chances we had."

With the win goes an automatic NCAA tournament berth for Penn State, 17-2-1, which came into the game tied as the number four team in the nation.

The Minutewomen (14-5-2) will have to wait until this afternoon to find out whether they have landed a national tournament spot.

"I think we'll get in," Hixon said, "but you never know. I don't think that there were any other huge upsets that would displace three or four teams. And being where we are at [number] eight, I think we're pretty safe. But nothing's cast in stone."

On Saturday, the Minutewomen halted Temple University's chances of gaining an automatic NCAA berth by disposing of the Owls. Senior forward Kathy DeAngelis gathered a rebound off a Jill Marple save and tucked it home to put the Minutewomen out in front to stay, 1-0, 27:15 into the game.

Senior forward Mara Frattasio scored her 12th and 13th goals of the season at 1:49 and 8:26 of the second half. Sophomore Dawn Trumbauer assisted on both goals,

Volleyball shut out at Harvard

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — Despite glimmers of potential, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team continues to be plagued with unsteady play, as it lost four games this weekend at the Harvard Tournament and its record continues to falter into the abyss (2-25).

Losing their first game Saturday to a stronger Yale team in three straight sets (15-7, 15-10, 15-9), the Minutewomen quickly found themseles in a hole in the tournament, down one game. The next game they found themselves pitted against Brown and had one of their stronger games in the first set, losing only 15-12.

"I think we played well against Brown," sad UMass coach Carol Ford.

However the second game of the match would be all Brown, as at one point the Bruins scored 11 unanswered points and UMass lost, 15-1. The Minutewomen quickly dropped the final game, 15-3.

In the third and final match Saturday, UMass came up against powerhouse Harvard and senior outside hitter Manda Schossberger. UMass gave the Crimson a good match, despite losing in three games, 15-7, 15-10, 15-10. The brightest for UMass in all three sets, and throughout the tournament, was Julieta Santiago, a senior who was playing in her last tournament with the team.

Gabrielli field goal provides the difference for UMass, 17-14

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Two years ago, Rob Courter was on top of the world. Faced with the pressure of winning a four-overtime game for the University of Richmond with one swing of his leg, Courter calmly drove the ball through the uprights to beat the University of Massachusetts.

How things change in two years. Saturday, in a game when one kick could have made all the difference in the world, it did. Courter misfired on three various field goal tries, all of which could have given his team a new life.

And in the end it was UMass counterpart Marco Gabrielli, having a rocky season himself, who buried a 23-yarder with 1:27 left, providing the winning margin for the Minutemen in their 17-14 win over the Spiders at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Interesting enough, it was the third time in the last four years that the Richmond-UMass game has been decided by a boot through the uprights, or lack thereof. In 1986, it was Silvio Bonvini's field goal that gave UMass a 24-21 win. A year later Bonvini had the crucial PAT miss that led the Richmond's win.

In all fairness, there were other miscues and misadventures that kept Richmond (1-8, 0-7 in the Yankee Conference) from winning only its second game of the season. But Courter took his share of the blame squarely.

"Things just didn't go right for me today," he said.

"[The field] was soft. I really don't know," said Richmond coach Jim Marshall. "He won't make an excuse and neither will I."

It wasn't exactly the best of days for Gabrielli either. The junior misfired from 27 yards out in the first half, as well as badly shanking a punt deep in Richmond territory and blowing an attempted squib kick to start the second half. But he would get his moment of atonement late in the game.

Richmond had just tied it with 5:13 to play on a 27-yard pass from quarterback Kyle Horner to fleet split end Marvin Hargrove. The play developed as Hargrove shook free from cornerback Don Caparotti, who slipped around the 15-yard line.

Students urged to take action against cuts

New bill in the legislature to cut more funds

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
and SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

The House Ways and Means committee proposed a bill yesterday to deal with the budget crisis in Massachusetts public higher education.

One of the four proposals is a 10 percent cut in funds used to pay for teaching assistants, research assistants, and student employees, said Student Trustee Eric Nakajima.

"It would be a major cut because we have already cut TA's," he said. "This would affect class sizes and in turn the amount of courses being offered to students."

Associate Chancellor James Leheney said, "The full cost of fringe benefits for trust-funded employees would be put on students as well."

He said trust-funded employees are paid out of any money not provided by the state, and include maintenance workers, dining common employees, and campus center employees.

"This would mean an increase in student fees in the spring," Leheney said. "It would also mean a cut in the amount of employees in these places."

Leheney said that the proposed fees would be confirmed by the end of the week.

Nakajima said the proposed bill also says that out-of-state students would pay the full cost of their education.

Leheney said that the actual "full cost" of a student's education is difficult to determine.

"The state has always subsidized a portion of every student's education. But non-tax payers, they feel, should pay the full cost. What that is will be announced," said Leheney.

Rep.Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) proposed an amendment that will be voted on by Friday. The amendment would reduce the proposed $53 million cut by $25 million.

Anthropology Professor John Cole and Nakajima urged students to call their representatives.

"We are at a crucial point now, as we will be for quite a long time. It is necessary for students to mobilize within the next few days,"he said. "Call your representatives, and have your families call your representatives as well in support of the Rosenberg Amendment."

Lecturers discuss gay, lesbian, bisexual issues

By BILL SHAUGHNESSY and MICHELLE MELLMAN
Collegian Correspondents

"Gay Life...Into the 90's," a joint lecture given last night by Neil Miller and Sue Hyde, covered the political agenda facing homosexuals now and in the future and also offered a personal insight into gay life in rural America.

Miller, author of In Search of Gay America, opened the evening by citing a chapter from his book about Al and John, two gay dairy farmers in Ogalvie, Minnesota. "The most interesting aspect of John and Al returning to the farm was that it brought about a reconciliation between them and their parents." John and Al, who both grew up on farms, moved to the city to seek the freedom to express their sexuality.

Expressing his optimism concerning prospects of gays living openly, Miller commented on "the large number of people I met in areas where one would assume you can't possibly be gay, who appeared to be relatively open about their sexuality and lived a life accepted by their neighbors."

Hyde, the Privacy Project Coordinator of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force addressed the audience of over 40 students, faculty, and community members in the Student Union Ballroom. She spoke of her work trying to appeal the many state sodomy laws which restrict gays sexual rights. "There is no such thing as private behavior for homosexual men and lesbians. Gays and lesbians must develop a public language to talk about sex and to talk

Hadley man arrested, charged with assault

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A 26-year-old man was arrested Friday night on Triangle St. after he allegedly pointed a shot gun at another man who was driving in a nearby car, police said.

Theodore C. Telega Jr., 26, of Hadley, was charged with being a disorderly person, assault with a dangerous weapon and possession of a fire arm on a college campus, police said. He is scheduled to be arraigned in Northampton District Court today.

According to police, the victim was travelling north on North Pleasant St. and pulled over to allow an ambulance and police cruiser to pass. As the driver was heading back into the travel lane, a truck pulled behind the car and tried to pass it.

Rally planned to protest budget cuts

March through campus to follow rally

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

A rally protesting budget cutbacks to higher education is scheduled to be held tomorrow on the Student Union steps, followed by a march to show solidarity with University of Massachusetts programs that have suffered from the cuts.

"The rally is to protest cuts against higher education being made in the Statehouse and to show that we're still as angry as when we were [at the rally] in Boston," said Marc Kenen, a graduate student coordinator of the Leadership Coalition, which is organizing the rally and the march.

The Leadership Coalition consists of representatives from the undergraduate and graduate student bodies, faculty and staff members, but not the administration, Kenen said.

"It's vital that we have thousands of people at the rally at this time to show the Statehouse we're watching," he said.

Jane Kiser, a coordinator of the coalition and a representative of the Graduate Student Employee Organization, said, "The march will go by various points on campus where there are programs being cut, such as the Labor Center and the Basic Math Program."

The Basic Math Program is slated to be eliminated at the end of this academic year and the Center for Labor Relations and Research's budget was slashed by 29 percent this semester.

"The rally is culminating the whole drive this week to call legislators and write post cards," Kiser said, adding the postcards addressed to state representatives and senators will be collected at the rally and delivered to them the same afternoon.

Amherst woman gives large piece of land to UMass

By PRESTON FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Janet Wilder Dakin, sister of the late playwright Thornton Wilder and widow of Northampton attorney Winthrop Dakin, has given the University of Massachusetts 27 acres of open land surrounding her home on East Pleasant Street in Amherst.

Dakin gave the land, which shares a border with the campus and is near the Sylvan Residence Area, to the University as part of a long-standing devotion to public and philanthropic causes, said Roger Hewett, director of planned giving at the Development Office.

Her husband was a founding trustee of Hampshire College. In 1970, the Dakins founded the Kestrel Trust, a private conservation organization.

Dakin was the founder of the Equine Center project, which in 1979 raised $250,000 for an indoor equestrian ring at the University.

Although Dakin and her husband "Toby" both graduated from private schools, they had an intense belief about the value and worth of public higher education, Hewett said.

"The Dakins realize that a public education is available to all, when private education is differentiated," Hewett said. "It is because of this reason that the Dakins chose to leave their property to the University."

Hewett said that there are no plans for the land other than to keep it open.

Two weeks ago more than a hundred people gathered at the Dakin residence to celebrate her decision to transfer the land to the University and to place the tax savings into an endowment for the upkeep of the house and grounds.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey attended the event, along with the William Smith Society, a group of friends of the University who have included the institution in their wills or have made "planned gift" commitments.

Dakin was presented with a certificate and a portrait engraving by artist Barry Moser of the first president of the land-grant college that became UMass.

The Dakin residence, when Dakin no longer needs it, will also be donated to the University along with the three acres it sits on, Hewett said.

"This is a gem of a place," Duffey said. "If a future administration wants to house a Nobel laureate for a semester, what a perfect place."

Duffey also said that the elegant house could be used for other purposes. "If they want to entertain with a string quartet, host the Board of Trustees, sequester themselves for a conference, hold a black tie dinner or have a alumni picnic — what a perfect place," he said.

First African student to attend Smith College dies

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Ng'endo Mwangi, who was the only African woman doctor in Kenya during her five years of military service there and was also the first African student to attend Smith College, died October 30.

Mwangi, who used the name Florence during her years at Smith, graduated in 1961 with a degree in the pre-medical sciences, Debra Bradely, the news director at Smith College said. Mwangi was born north of Nairobi in the highlands of Kenya.

After her graduation, Mwangi attended the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York.

Upon completion of her medical internship, she returned to Kenya in 1967. Until 1972, Mwangi served the Kenya government as a doctor at the Kenyatta National Hospital. When she resigned, she moved to the rural Ahti River area to open a medical clinic to help the people who needed medical care.

The Ahti River Clinic, 35 miles southeast of Nairobi, was said to have served 300,000 people, mainly of the Masai tribe, Bradley said.

Bradley said Mwangi described her work, "I am the only doctor with a staff of four. We are always busy. Our patients are poor."

Mwangi felt the clinic was no longer adequately serving the people because they often had to walk 50 to 70 miles just to reach it, Bradley said. In efforts to provide the Masai people with better medical care, Mwangi developed a plan for a three-part medical facility which was to include several mobile clinics, a base clinic, and a 50-bed hospital.

The Smith College Class of 1973 voted to rename the Afro-American Cultural Center to the Mwangi Cultural Center, Bradley said. At the second annual Black Alumni Banquet in 1981, this honor was remembered in a speech.

"Mwangi demonstrated our need as black people to be aware of the ongoing responsibility to put our skills and knowledge to work in our communities and in the larger black community," a speaker at the banquet said.

In 1987, Mwangi received an honorary doctor of science degree from Smith College. At this time, she was undergoing cancer treatment.

Mwangi died in Kenya after complications following surgery. She leaves a daughter Wambui Mwangi who is a senior at Smith College.

Two pairs of skis missing from the UMass Ski Sale

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A vendor at the UMass Ski Club's Ski Snatch reported two pairs of Rossignol skis were stolen sometime late Friday night, police said.

The vendor took inventory when the sale ended for the night Friday, and taking inventory again Saturday morning, discovered the loss, which was estimated at $845, police said.

In other police reports:

ACCIDENTS

- A vehicle pulling out onto Governor's Drive hit another vehicle Friday. Damage was estimated at $2,000.
- A Granby police cruiser parked at the Drug Laboratory at Morrill Science Building Friday was struck on the left door by an unknown vehicle.
- Two cars collided Friday on Eastman Lane after one car travelling south on the Sylvan Horseshoe skidded onto Eastman Lane.

LARCENY

- A man reported his 10-speed bike was stolen Friday from a bike rack outside Thoreau Residence Hall. The bike was valued at $200.
- A man left his wallet on a bench in the employees' locker room Friday in Hampshire Dining Commons and later discovered it missing. He lost personal papers, identification and a small amount of cash.
- A man reported his cassette recorder was stolen Friday from his office in Morrill Science Building. The loss was valued at $200.
- A Patterson Residence Hall woman reported $45 cash was stolen from her room Friday. Upon returning to her room, she found another woman she didn't know in her room. She chased the woman down the hall and was able to furnish police with a description.

Students discuss DOD funding

Five PSRU members attend conference in Pennslyvania

By BETH BANDY
Collegian Correspondent

PHILADELPHIA — Five representatives from People for a Socially Responsible University (PSRU) Saturday discussed Department of Defense funding on campus at a Student Action Union (SAU) conference at Pennsylvania State University.

PSRU has been attending conferences across the country this fall, the most recent of which was the Progressive Student Network conference in Iowa City at the end of October, said Emily Katz, a Hampshire College student who attended the conference.

The conferences are held in an attempt to link up with other activists working against Department of Defense research in American universities, she said.

Christina Boutilier, a UMass student who was also at the conference, said, "There are starting to be a lot of student activists working against Department of Defense funding research on campus."

She added, "The argument that if we didn't accept DOD funding at UMass it would just go someplace else is invalid."

The SAU presented several workshops, including how to organize to secure abortion rights and rights for the handicapped, as well as how to fight racism.

"Anything that was ever won in the issue of abortion rights was won by these massive demonstrations," said Heather Randall, a member of the Young Socialists Alliance and coordinator of the workshop titled "Fight for Abortion Rights," in reference to the upcoming pro-choice rally in Washington D.C.

Brian Glick, a New York lawyer and author of War At Home, presented a workshop on FBI harassment of student activists.

He said that throughout the 1980s, the FBI's presence on campus has taken the form of infiltration of student organizations, vandalism of student-owned property, and general intimidation of student activists by FBI agents and police officers.

He added that there needs to be some kind of restriction on what kind of activities the FBI can pursue.

"It's kind of like the speed limit," he said. "Nobody obeys it, but at least it's a limit."

Fraternity wins prize for raising money

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Sigma Phi Epsilon came in first place in a recent phon-a-thon to raise money for the Newman center, the Catholic center on campus, said Tim Rondeau, public relations coordinator for Sigma Phi Epsilon.

Sigma Phi Epsilon received a $250 prize for earning more than $11,000 for the center, he said.

In a phon-a-thon in which students called alumni and asked them to pledge money to the center, the Greek area raised more than $30,000, he said.

John Tanka, a brother of Sig Ep, said the Greek area and other private volunteers combined raised over $160,000.

Alpha Chi Omega also received a prize for earning over $10,000, the second largest contribution made by a Greek area fraternity or sorority, he said.

Rondeau said Father Quiqley began this annual phon-a-thon six years ago to raise money for the center.

He said the center "serves as a vital part of many students lives academically, socially, and religiously."

The center contains several reading rooms, a cafeteria famous for its cookies, and a Catholic Church, he said.

He added that the Newman center is a non-profit organization which receives no money from the University.

The phon-a-thon accounts for over one third of the center's budget, he said.

about it openly," Hyde said.

"The gays and lesbians community today has the political status of untouchables, our enemies despise us, our friends won't fully embrace us because we are so despised. The official government attack on gay people is amplified on how we are viewed in such a visible way," Hyde said.

Hyde said gays must become a stronger group internally and they must change public consciousness that gays are not vulnerable to attack by innuendo.

Ray Paquette from Belchertown said, "Sue Hyde highlighted the fact that even though on the surface lesbians, gays and bisexuals can live safe lives, there's a lot of work left to do to guarantee our freedoms."

Diane Synder, of Springfield, said, "I think that awareness week is definitely a good thing. I just wish that the program focused more on the bisexuals rather than just the gays and lesbians. I don't think a person is totally gay or lesbian, I think people who are open about being able to love the opposite sex as well as the same sex are basically strong and loveable people. Most people who classify themselves as a gay or lesbian were at one time involved with a member of the opposite sex, therefore classifying them as bisexual."

Instead of passing the car, Telega inched beside the car and allegedly pointed a shotgun at the driver, police said.

The driver of the car proceeded to Massachusetts and Commonwealth avenues where he saw a Lenox police car. He informed the officer of the incident, police said. The Lenox police followed the truck and apprehended Telega on Triangle St. University of Massachusetts and Amherst police were also notified and arrived at the scene.

Police linked the incident to an accident that occurred moments before on Massachusetts Ave.

The driver of the car was heading west on Massachusetts Ave. and while attempting a U-turn, hit the curb, police said. The driver then backed up and his car struck Telega's truck, police said. No estimate of damage was available yesterday.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Encourage those who care

In reviewing Statehouse politicians' views on public higher education, students have correctly taken an "us" and "them" attitude. Unfortunately, there have been more "thems."

One politician fighting for an increased public higher education budget is Amherst's own Stan Rosenberg.

For the life of the current budget crisis, Rosenberg has advocated for the state's public higher education system, be it through bills he sponsored, rallies he attended, or meetings at which he spoke.

While students should battle anti-education representatives, such as House Speaker George Keverian, D-Everett, they should also remember to encourage politicians who care.

Rosenberg cares.

Ethnocentricity in quake coverage

As a native of the Bay Area on exchange at UMass, I was saddened to find not only false information and discrepancies in news reports, but also California-bashing on the Collegian's editorial page the same day as the quake coverage.

Whether the "ostrich meat" article ("We must save the ostrich!," Oct. 18) was supposed to be humorous or not, it degrades both the state of California and environmental groups all over America. The environment and its conservation is not funny.

Printing this affront in the wake of such a tragedy wasn't careless, it was cruel to those of us wondering if our loved ones were dead or alive. It also perpetuated yet another false, and downright assinine stereotype of California.

Also, the Collegian and even "real" papers like the Boston Globe and the New York Times printed several inaccurate logistical informations concerning areas affected by the quake — information crucial for New England residents trying to contact loved ones through organizations like the Red Cross.

There also seems to be an "it figures" attitude here about the quake, what with the abundance of jokes filtering around campus (so funny this Californian forgot to laugh) and editorials about Californian architecture being unprepared for such a quake.

If Californians are supposedly so unprepared for a quake of this magnitude, then could a New Englander please explain to me why Candlestick park's expansion buttresses held up, the Bay Bridge only lost one relatively small section (and every other bridge held up) and every single skyscraper in downtown San Francisco remains standing today?

Perhaps this quake is still a very distant occurence for people who have no ties to California. I want people, on a campus which claims to strive for equality and an end to bigotry, to end this horrible ethnocentricity and "California sucks" attitude which is hurting both Californians and New Englanders, reinforcing divisions in the so-called United States.

Equality for all, no laughing matter

While I was talking with some friends the other night, one of them decided to tell a joke. He began with "What's the difference between a woman and a refrigerator?"

I was immediately uncomfortable with the implied relationship between a woman's sexual organs and a refrigerator. When the punch-line was delivered, I was sickened not so much by the joke, (for graphic stupidity is nothing new) but by the reaction of my friends who thought the joke was hilariously funny.

On campus where security has been cut at the expense of students' safety and where rape is common, this is not funny.

A joke that crudely compares sex to opening a refrigerator and reduces women to mere machines is more offensive than ethnic jokes because it offends all women of all races.

We're hostages of our policy

On Nov. 3, 1979, Iranian students stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Fifty-two American citizens were then held hostage for 444 days.

On Nov. 4, 1989, approximately 15,000 people gathered outside of the former U.S. Embassy to celebrate the ten-year anniversary of the seizure of those American citizens.

Meredith O'Brien

Well, 10 years and two presidents later, the United States has formed no concrete policy to deal with terrorism abroad. Official policy dictates that we do not make concessions or deals with terrorists. Period.

In the mean time, Americans are still being held hostage all around the globe. In spite of pleas from family and friends of hostages who have been waiting for even a parcel of information regarding the condition of their loved ones, the government stands tall and firm. (Read my lips.) No concessions. Period.

The 10th anniversary of this tragic hostage crisis causes reflection of this policy which dictates no concessions or conciliatory deals to free hostages.

There is a glaring contradiction in this supposedly strong terrorist policy. There are few, if any, successes with it.

Some may turn to the release of these 52 hostages as a glowing success for Ronald Reagan, not Jimmy Carter — who had made too many concessions and was viewed as weak and spineless by the majority of the American people.

Coincidentally, in a suspiciously dramatized fashion, Reagan was able to announce the release of the hostages on the night of his inauguration.

What a testimony to the advent of such a "strong" presidency!

But some nagging questions about their release remain. (For anyone who has read the book October Surprise, these questions have already been addressed.)

Did the 1980 Reagan campaign — with its contacts through the CIA (Bush) and other top-seeded Republicans who were dying to get liberal Democrats out of the Oval Office — actually promise the Iranian government U.S. arms if they held the hostages until Carter was out of office?

The people in the Reagan camp knew that if Carter was able to negotiate the release of the hostages, it was very likely that he would be able to pull ahead in the polls and retain his executive seat. The weak countenance of the Carter administration would remain in the minds of the American electorate unless a release was achieved.

If these rumors are true, though there are no tangible facts to affirm them, Reagan completely disregarded his own basic tenet of foreign policy that was espoused throughout his reign.

In the wake of the recent Iran-Contra affair, where the United States did trade arms for hostages, a deal cut in 1980 to hold off the hostage release seems plausible.

Our entire terrorist policy of no concessions seems like a sham in the face of these behind-the-scenes disclosures.

What is our policy now?

Does George Bush still adhere to the unbending, uncompromising policy of no concessions? He has yet to make a move to facilitate the release of the hostages that are still being held in Beirut — left over from the Reagan administration and its no concession policy.

Compromise is how we confirmed a constitution, how policies should be determined. Compromise is how people deal with one another when there are conflicts of interest. It's the civil way to solve problems. A no concessions policy is hardly the way to resolve or conclude a potentially violent situation.

Meanwhile . . . those hostages are still waiting for the no concessions policy to succeed.

Civility Week is an event that has been established at UMass to examine racism, sexism, homophobia, anti-Semitism, and any other discriminatory actions or beliefs. What did you think about this year's Civility Week? Is a Civility Week necessary? Does it accomplish anything? Do you think one week is too much (or too little) to devote to civility?

Send the message that has not been made loud enough

It's time for something radical.

Rallies against the budget cuts, like the one planned for tomorrow, continue to have a minimal effect on the people in power. Chancellor Duffey is doing everything short of pulling teeth to get some attention, and Student Trustee Eric Nakajima could start taking courses at Framingham State and the like — he's been there that much.

No one is seeing the big picture.

The biggest picture I can see is that House Speaker George Keverian is throwing his weight around in the Statehouse, advocating for additional cuts to higher education before considering a tax package.

In spite of all the cuts — and lets face facts, we've been cut more than our fair share — Keverian wants more. The rally in Boston was a student stampede, the report Chancellor Duffey is writing — outlining the devastating effects of cuts — will gather dust alongside other relevant pieces of mail Keverian has received.

Public higher education is six percent of the state's budget, yet 38 percent of the latest cuts came from public higher education. If this does not suggest an anti-education stance in the Statehouse, what does?

It's time the University of Massachusetts considers something dramatic.

Let's strike.

David R. Mark

It's not unheard of, and since we've all paid our tuition, the state has no grounds to get rid of us. Students, faculty and staff should pick a period of time to stop doing our jobs. We should spend that time sitting by the pond or on the Student Union Steps to rally and protest.

The last time a student strike occurred was in 1970, when students protested the ongoing war in Vietnam. The whole incident is highlighted in the most recent issue of Spectrum. (If you can find an issue of the magazine, read the article.)

The entire campus would have to be together on this. Classes would have to be cancelled; no one could be punished for striking. At the same time, resident assistants would have to organize their floors to make sure people didn't take the day off.

If done responsibly, and with the help of not just the University's administration but a decent public relations machine, we may be able to send the message that has not been made loud enough.

The problem with higher education is not the students, it's the politicians.

People may feel students are not responsible enough to carry out a strike, but with people like Nakajima leading the way, and with the support of Duffey, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson and State Representative Stan Rosenberg, I won't be worried.

The budget cuts have wreaked havoc on the University. It's time the students wreak havoc on the conscious' of our beloved representatives in the Statehouse.

Spying on the hip novelists of the eighties

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

This is not the usual around the corner-peeping Tom-drag some names through the New York celeb mud bath-type journalism. This time Spy magazine has conducted some extensive research, done some pretty close reading, and used their analytical New York minds to produced a book. But this isn't just any book. As a student with an upcoming paper or exam, what picture comes to mind when you think of a yellow book cover with black strips? If you thought Cliff Notes you're on the right track.

The Spy Notes cover looks like the real thing, but in between the diagonal black lines on the top of the cover the word "satire" is printed in hot pink ink.

The cover reads: Spy Notes on McInerney's Bright Lights, Big City; Janowitz's Slaves of New York; Ellis's Less Than Zero ...And All Those Other Hip Urban Novels of the 1980s.

Ah, satire, I thought to myself as I opened this parody manual.

But this satire is not really created in the chapter summaries and commentaries, which are in fact in keeping with the standard Cliff Notes style.

The notion of such a project is where the idea of parody falls into play. Spy Notes discusses 15 novels by ten authors. The collective works of fiction by these authors are often times semi-autobiographical and are notoriously chock full of "high-style cocaine abuse and wanton promiscuity."

Figaro's divorce is our delight

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Last weekend, the Amherst College Department of Theater and Dance presented Odon Von Horath's Figaro Gets A Divorce. Von Horath, a German aristocrat struck dead by a tree in Paris at age 36, is virtually unknown in this country, except among cognoscenti. His Figaro is a pithy, spicy, ironic 20th century comedy (notwithstanding what wallop it loses in the translation.) about the vicissitudes of two couples in the 1930's. Figaro, a street smart, diplomatic character, and his wife Susanna are the royal servants of Count and Countess Almaviva, whom they usher safely from their besieged castle and a rabid mob in Germany to safe heaven in Austria.

With his handsome looks and Brahmin posing, Andrei Michael Herasimchuk was perfectly cast as the count. Wendy Rich was also very convincing as the sympathetic, naive Susanna who matures with confidence. Lisi DeHaas as the Countess had too ineffectual a role to impress the viewer for better or worse.

Which leads us with Ted Ridgeway's Figaro. Although he delivered the substantial dialogue almost flawlessly and carried the play because he had most of the best bits, I don't feel he invested Figaro with the spirit of audacity and spunk the role is intended to portray. He was not scintillating, but still effective enough to give an idea of how exhilarating the show could have been.

Special attention must be accorded Alain Hunkins as the gardener. In his brief scenes at the orphanage, he played the dim witted but opinionated man of the earth with such conviction — hunched over the wheelbarrow in his humble clothing and unshaven face — that he was, however brief his role, the star of the show.

Congratulations to director Michael Birtwistle for a meaningful and worthy vehicle; to Suzanne Palmer Dougan for inventive sets and judicious costuming; to Michael Baumgarten for his tasteful lighting design and to a strong supporting cast of about 30 actors.

Funkin' out with George Clinton

By PHIL STRAUB
Collegian Correspondent

George Clinton and the P-Funk All Stars
Campus Center Auditorium
Saturday, Nov. 4

Imagine 15 people on stage, each wearing a large space costume ridiculously outrageous enough to put even the Krofft Superstars to shame. Platform shoes are in abundance, as all compete for a guest spot on I'm Gonna Git You, Sucka. The spaceship descends from above and out comes Dr. Funkenstein. There was a time when this could be expected, but alas, the theatrical/psychedelic side of the 70s were left for dead long ago.

Maybe you got off on the contemporary vinyl sounds of Clinton's crew and were hoping for a more modern approach. But Saturday night's repertoire contained only two songs from The Cinderella Theory (both of the hits "Why Should I Dog U Out" and "Tweakin"), and 90 percent of the selections were originally recorded in the 70s. But no matter your personal orientation, one thing is certain, there was enough funk packed into the Campus Center Auditorium to shake your rump twice over.

The show was slow to start, but it made no difference. The P-Funk All-Stars packed the stage with three horn players, one drummer, a couple of percussionists, a keyboardist, a few bass players, three to four guitarists, and a whole mess of vocalists. They started with "Red Hot Mama," a stinging raver that led into a 30-minute mega-mix heralding Clinton's arrival.

Clinton took the stage in all his multicolored, hair-raising glory. The band jumped into "Gamin' On Ya" while Clinton whipped the crowd into an arm-waving frenzy. When Clinton first arrived on stage, he asked the crowd, "Are you sure you want to turn this motherfucker out?" Although they responded in the affirmative, many in the crowd began to have second thoughts, some even leaving in desperation. But throughout the two-and-a-half-hour set, Clinton kept baiting the crowd, yelling, "We're not leaving yet, you asked for it, now we're going to turn this mutha out!"

Finally satisfied with the situation, Clinton closed with "What is Soul." Then he and the 15-plus All-Stars left the stage for parts unknown.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

POWER addresses women's rights

New RSO organizes for Washington D.C. rally, plans agenda

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

The first organization started on campus that is solely dedicated to issues concerning women's rights has finally become a Registered Student Organization, but the Progressive Organization for Women's Rights has not had time to celebrate.

POWER has had a very heavy schedule since it first began last spring. The organization, first called UMass NOW, gained RSO status in October after deciding against becoming a chapter of the National Organization for Women last spring. "We had to be totally student run, and we didn't want to force members to pay the national dues," said Carla Halpern, co-president of POWER.

> "We're laying the groundwork for this organization to be here for years to come."
> - Gina Gombar, co-president of POWER

So, the women's rights group decided to name themselves POWER, "It's a catchy acronym that embodied what we are trying to do," said Halpern, adding that the "E" is for implied equality with all human beings.

"Women are human first and foremost," Halpern said, "We would like to work toward changing attitudes."

And changing attitudes is the main theme at the Rally for reproductive rights in Washington D.C. this Sunday. POWER has been organizing bus transportation in conjunction with the Abortion Rights Fund, and Gina Gombar, co-president of POWER, said that one bus has been filled, but that does not reflect the number of students intending to attend the rally. "We expect a rush at the end of the week," Gombar said.

POWER has been organizing transportation to Washington D.C. as well as collecting signatures for a proposed referendum for a pro-choice amendment from their table on the Campus Center Concourse twice a week.

The petition, from Campaign for Choice, calls for freedom to make personal reproductive decisions without government interference, and the right to choose or refuse birth control and abortion. The petition has already been signed by "a couple hundred people," Halpern said.

"This would safeguard [the right to obtain an abortion] even if Roe v. Wade were overturned," Gombar added.

The abortion issue is a large part of POWER's agenda, and both Gombar and Halpern feel that the voices of the pro-choice contingency are very important. "We are pro-life," Halpern said, "It infuriates me that the anti-choice movement has stolen the word 'life,' they are not pro-women, or pro-children," she said.

"I don't believe that life ends at birth, it's important to work for people's lives after they're born," she said, giving examples of working to end discrimination, working to give housing to the poor, and food to the hungry.

The rally in Washington D.C. will be matched with a rally in the area sponsored by the Western Massachusetts Coalition for Reproductive Freedom and Springfield NOW for people who cannot attend the rally in Washington.

"It'll be in Springfield, or Amherst or Northampton," said Halpern, who expects a few hundred people, although she will be attending the rally in Washington D.C.

POWER's energies have not been simply focused on the Washington rally; they began the semester with a Take Back the Night March, worked with People for Choice for Rosie Jimenez Day, held a clinic defense training session for women, and are coordinating a boycott of Dominos Pizza this week, Halpern and Gombar said.

POWER will be holding a Take Back the Thigh speak out and consciousness raising session this month to show the "tyranny of media imaging of women," and women's fear of fat, Halpern said. The group will also be focusing on setting up an Alert System to warn student and non-student groups of blockades and attacks on abortion clinics, as well as networking with other colleges in the area, and having an international women's day, Gombar said.

"We've packed a lot into the semester, and there has been a tremendous amount of support," said Gombar, "It shows that we are needed very much."

The future? "It's difficult working within the constraints of a semester," she said. "Right now we're laying the ground work for years to come."

EWC struggles with cuts, community feels effects

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center, often cited as among the most valuable resources available to women on the University of Massachusetts campus, is struggling to maintain an adequate level of services after budget cuts have left them over $80,000 short of their previous budget, according to the center's director, Carol Wallace.

The cuts have meant the abolition of two programs — the Women's Admissions and General Education Services Program, [WAGES], and the Working Women's Program; and a loss of over $32,000 in the center's operating budget, which includes student salaries, photocopying, and telephone and postage, Wallace said in an interview last Friday.

Wallace said she fears that the University has singled out programs geared toward re-entry and non-traditional students and that in cutting these programs, the University is becoming less accessible to low income students, single parents, welfare recipients, and non-English speaking students.

"There is a perception that the University is cutting those programs that provide access to populations that historically have been excluded from higher education," she said, "Combine that with higher costs and new student fees, and the University becomes increasingly elitist."

Executive Vice Chancellor and Provost Richard O'Brien, said that "there is certainly no central administration policy of cutting out areas of working students or certainly of special students. . . What you may be seeing is that some of the cuts have been to far more vocal groups than others."

The WAGES program assisted students who needed a range of support services before they could return to school. It helped them with housing and childcare, admissions, dealing with the welfare system, and cutting through red tape.

Wallace said the loss of the program has had a noticeable impact in the community. "A lot of women call because they've heard of WAGES, and as soon as they hear there is no re-entry program, they're not interested in the University."

The second program, cut when the center was forced to freeze a full-time staff position, was the Working Women's program. The program offered assistance to women experiencing problems like sexual harassment and discrimination in the workplace, women in the trades, and unemployed and non-traditional students.

Equally crippling to the center's budget has been cuts to the three components of its operating budget, including student's salaries, duplicating and supplies, and telephone and postage. These cuts, averaging 50 percent, have rendered some basic functions of the center obsolete, according to Wallace.

Four months into fiscal 1989, for instance, the budget for long distance phone calls has been used up, Wallace said. "We are dealing with women in crises here, and they are told when they call that if the person they're looking for is not available they'll have to call back," she said.

"We're operating in a deficit situation, and we have been since August," Wallace said.

The Everywoman's Center has historically operated as a referral center for community women in crises. With no money for phone calls or postage, it is finding its ability to update resource lists and maintain contacts with support centers in the larger community severely hampered, according to Wallace.

She said they have already limited referrals to the tri-county area, adding, "We're talking about limiting further because many towns in the tri-county area are toll calls," Wallace said."

To compensate for the losses, the center is relying more heavily on work study students and volunteers, circulating and posting memos instead of copying, using bulk mailings, and not making long distance calls, Wallace said. She said that she is confident in the center's ability to increase fundraising efforts.

Professor recounts history of Women's Studies Dept.

By HEIDI BABINSKY
Collegian Correspondent

The Women's Studies department at the University of Massachusetts is often quickly and accurately connected with the topic of feminism. For Arlene Avakian, a women's studies professor since 1974, an interpretation of feminism begins with trying to end domination and subordination in relationships.

"To me feminism includes trying to change the world with respect to women and all of the things that impinge upon women's lives," she said.

Although particular aspects of women's lives should not be overlooked, Avakian said that gender, racism, sexism, poverty, and class should not be viewed as one being more important than another, but on how these things interact.

Interacting and uniting is exactly how the women's studies major developed, according to Avakian, who gives the following account of the department's history.

In 1974 a subcommittee of faculty proposed a women's studies major that was designated as a two year experimental program. However, no money was provided. After recieving a letter of protest from the subcommittee, the provost, in order to avoid embarrasment to the University, allcoated the the necessary funds.

In turn, the provost granted four teaching assistants and a part-time coordinator to the newly approved women's studies department. Thus, the women's studies department was born of an unconcquerable enthusiasm for feminism.

And feminist activity was what changed Avakian's life. "I played the typical wife and mommy roles," she said, "Feminism said that there are other things in life. That doesn't mean you can't be married and raise children, but that you as a woman have a right to something more, and that was very liberating to me."

Avakian noted that in the early 70's there was a more distinct women's movement and one could actually point to the consciousness raising groups: to the women's health clinic, to the battered women's shelter and to the woman's center.

Now not only have there been substantial improvements and expansions to these feminist features, but feminists themselves are in many different places, both on campus and in the community.

And that is not all that has changed through the years. In the early 1970's, Avakian said classes were small and she could recognize most students. Today the 300 plus students enrolled in various women's studies classes overcrowd the lecture halls.

Avakian said she realizes some students are only enrolled because of a general education requirement; however, she no longer senses hostility and is thrilled by the students' assertive participation.

Generally speaking, 10 percent of the women's studies classes are occupied by males who, Avakian explains, "chose to take women's studies classes because they are interested in learning more about women."

Avakian said that those pursuing feminist goals both on and off campus face a real struggle. "Most of the students on campus can't remember a time when we had a Democratic president," she said, "Our generation has grown up through the times of Reagan and now of Bush.

Progressive values and progressive policies have been under serious attack, she continued, "We are struggling against forces that are very powerful and very conservative and want to turn the clocks back..."

Although there is exceptional support in our culture for feminist ideal, the struggle persists, according to Avakian.

As for future accomplishments in feminism, she says she would be delighted if every student who came to this university was made to think about the arrangements between men and women.

"If every student was made to think about the power relationships between men and women; if they were made to understand that what we consider to be natural for males and females is a result of our culture, then we would see that our culture is socially constructed. It has very little to do with biology. I would want those people to change the world - I would want them to go out and live different lives and help to change the world so that women's lives could be better," she concluded.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Keep your eyes open! Unexpected encounters and professional opportunities are featured. By compartmentalizing your life, you can retain your friendships and preserve valuable business connections.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Indecision could be making you restless. Time spent in meditation will show you the right path. Seek lighthearted entertainment tonight. Rent or borrow a video. Avoid too many snacks.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Words said in anger could seriously damage an important relationship. Do not skirt issues, but do temper your opinions with diplomacy. You will get the intellectual exercise your mind needs.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A pet project you have devoted much time and money to could suddenly turn sour. Your adaptability sees you through with flying colors. Give advice to loved one only if asked.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Your usual sound judgment could desert you today. Act accordingly. Do not stew over broken promises. New investment possibilities should not be ignored. Give romance a second chance.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Hard work and long hours will bring you the rewards you seek. You may decide to change your home's decor to reflect your current lifestyle. An afternoon shopping trip will yield many fine bargains.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Take investment advice with a grain of salt. Be on your best behavior at a business or social extravaganza. Look for ways to stretch your money. Show some restraint in purchasing books and records.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Teenagers find part-time employment to help finance their education. Be honest with yourself about the way things stand between you and family member. Personal relationships could be sensitive.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): An investment opportunity deserves further study. An expert can help you turn a creative hobby into a business venture. A visit with an old friend becomes nostalgic. Be sentimental.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan. 19): Investment luck is strong. Investigate a person or company seeking your endorsement. Community affairs cut into your leisure time. The gratification you get will more than compensate you.

AQUARIUS(Jan.21-Feb.18): An unusual offer is on its way. Weigh the pros and cons very carefully. There could be too many strings attached. Accept a spur-of-the-moment invitation. Romance is in the air!

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20) The emphasis today is on fresh ideas and innovative approaches. Solutions do not come easily, but they will prove long-lasting. Those in sales can use the telephone more effectively. Broaden your social contacts.

Arts Attack

Many critics have scorned these books claiming they have absolutely no literary value whatsoever, though some find them great fun, especially Spy subscribers. Spy realizes that the themes in these books are overlap and interweave [read redundant], but still, this book has a public-serving purpose.

Spy tells its readers this book will satisfy mild curiosity, clear up confusion, and (most importantly) hasten the acquisition of pop cultural literacy, which in turn will help the naive reader understand Socrates' phrase, "How many things I have no need of?"

But need is simply a relative term. If you've read any or all of the pop classics covered in Spy Notes you will laugh at the clarity in which the summaries are expounded upon. The discussion of each book opens with a biographical note on the author followed by a cast of characters which affords pertinent basics. "A 29 year-old art student graduate living in NYC. He is a painter and thinks he is a genius."

The summary section gives us the straight dope. We find out who did what with whom, in what position, and on what substances. "He goes to the ladies' bathroom with a different woman. They take cocaine together and ..."

After summary we get commentary which is Freudian at best. It identifies the symbolism of these whacked out characters' actions. After each chapter is discussed there are some questions for review which challenge the reader to use factual and literal understanding and apply it to the creatively profound questions. "What effect did Ellis hope to achieve by italicizing certain passages in the book? Do you care?"

This book is not all fact; it has fun too. Open to its center and you will find the Novel-O-Matic fiction writing device which enables you fill in a story with plot details to your liking. Turn to the back and you will find helpful charts and diagrams. If reading about all these cool novelists fascinates you to such an extent that you are considering a career change, check out the one titled, "Becoming the Literary Voice of a Generation."

You buy this book because:
a. You have an unquenched thirst to read and read about all the pop fiction you possibly can.
b. You are too busy living the 'Bright Lights' lifestyle to read these books, but you want to make sure you're doing it (sort of) right.
c. You've spent countless hours reading and rereading the books of this genre, but you still can't figure out what it all means.

Feel free to write in your own choice "D," but no matter what your reason is, relax!—there's no final exam.

N.B. Related gossip: Last August Cliff Notes Inc. received an injunction against Spy to prevent publication of Spy Notes on the basis of cover-look-alike confusion (please!). "Their cover was identical to ours, and we didn't want a student to get ripped off," said Dick Spellman, Cliff company president. Mid-Spetember the injunction was lifted by the 2nd US Circuit Court of Appeals in New York and is available at bookstores everywhere — even locally.

O'Brien takes advantage of Patriots' secondary

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — The fall of the New England Patriots' pass defense began last summer.

Its guts were ripped out in the final pre-season game when end Garin Veris, linebacker Andre Tippett and cornerback Ronnie Lippett suffered season-ending injuries.

Lippett's replacement, six-year veteran Rod McSwain, went on injured reserve after the third game of the season. Raymond Clayborn, the Patriots' only other veteran cornerback, left Sunday's game in the first quarter with a thigh bruise.

The latest injury was good news to Ken O'Brien, who hasn't had much of it.

The New York Jets' quarterback, who had gone five games without a touchdown pass, saw rookies Maurice Hurst and Eric Coleman at cornerback. Rookies Rodney Rice and Howard Feggins were their only backups.

O'Brien also saw a lot of wide-open receivers in the Jets' 27-26 victory. The Jets (2-7) ended a five-game losing streak. New England, losing while the cornerbacks are learning, is 3-6.

Clayborn was replaced by second-round draft choice Coleman, who played with two hamstring strains and was victimized on touchdown passes of 35 yards to JoJo Townsell and 29 yards to Chris Burkett.

Hurst, in his seventh start of the season, was the primary culprit on a last-minute, 72-yard drive that set up Pat Leahy's 23-yard, final-play field goal.

New York also was missing injured layers. Its top two tight ends, Mickey Shuler and K.D. Dunn, went on injured reserve last week. But the Jets' backups came through.

O'Brien completed four consecutive passes to substitute tight ends on the winning march - three for 36 yards to Keith Neubert and one for another 36 to Greg Werner that got the ball to the New England 6-yard line one play before Leahy's kick.

"The pass to Werner down the middle in the last drive was my responsibility," said Hurst, a fourth-round draft choice from Southern University. "I had the inside (coverage) and he got inside on me."

Last season, when three-time Pro Bowler Clayborn started all 16 games, Lippett started 15 and McSwain one, the Patriots allowed just 13 touchdown passes. This season, they already have allowed 20 in nine games, second in the NFL to the Jets' 21.

The low point came Sunday when the Patriots gave three touchdowns to an offense that had just one in its previous five games.

"It's been a trying and testing season on the young cornerbacks confidence," Hurst said. "We want to play error-free but we have put pressure on the other guys because of our mistakes."

Without Veris and Tippett, the Patriots haven't put much pressure on quarterbacks. The Jets had allowed nine sacks a week earlier and were averaging 4.4 per game. The Patriots had only two Sunday.

Cowens nominated for Hall

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — Basketball Hall of Fame officials announced Monday that former Boston Celtics star Dave Cowens has been added to the list of players renominated for election.

Jerry Healy, Hall of Fame publicist, said Cowens name had been inadvertently omitted from the list of nominees released last Tuesday and the error was not discovered immediately. His addition brings the short list of candidates back up to 16.

Former NBA Commissioner Larry O'Brien, who had been renominated as a contributor, withdrew his name last week in protest over the Hall of Fame's secret election process.

Nominees need at least 18 votes of the 24-member Honors Committee to gain election to the Hall of Fame. Results of the voting are announced in February.

Nominated for the first time were players Nate Archibald, Elvin Hayes, Bob Lanier and Calvin Murphy and former Marquette Coach Al McGuire. Renominated as players were Walt Bellamy, Dave Bing, the late Larry Foust, Ann Meyers, Earl Monroe and Nera White.

Renominated as coaches were Jack Hartmen, Jack Ramsay and Wil Robinson and sportscaster Curt Gowdy, who served as Hall of Fame president for seven years, was renominated as a contributor.

The Bruins capitalized on six of 10 man-up opportunities.

Scoring for UMass were Miller and McIver, two goals each, and G.T. Ladd and Mike Melanson, one goal each.

The Minutemen ended their weekend with an anticlimactic win over Yale, 15-11.

The emotions of the team swayed up and down throughout the contest. UMass led 5-1, allowed Yale back in 5-5, led again 9-5, slipped to 9-8 before winning 15-11.

"We blew hot and cold," said Yarworth.

How does he feel about the weekend in Harvard?

"I'm a little disappointed," he said. "We've finished third in this tournament three years in a row. We're tired of it."

All he can do now is sit and wait for the word on the Easterns.

end, they'll probably scrap the whole system and just flip a coin.

So, that's the scoop. Hopefully this clears matters up a little for you. Frankly, we're still pretty confused about it.

Anyway. On a more local note . . .

Swimmers open up at Boyden Pool

Women look for 2nd win in as many meets

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Taking a back seat to the women's soccer team and field hockey team who both competed in tournaments this weekend, not to mention the football team, the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team convincingly defeated Smith College on Saturday afternoon at Smith over in Northampton in UMass' first meet of the season.

UMass received a record breaking performance in the 200-meter backstroke by freshman Kari Edwardsen, breaking teammate Michele Leary's freshman record set in 1986.

As for Leary, "Michele Leary swam awesome," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb. Newcomb was very pleased with the results of Saturday's meet, a meet which he termed as, "an experimental meet."

"We had a lot of people swimming events which they won't be swimming on Saturday versus UConn. We had people keying on one or two events other than four events which they will probably be doing on Saturday."

Newcomb need not look to Saturday for his next meet, because tomorrow afternoon (4 p.m., Boyden Pool) the University of Vermont invades UMass for the Minutewomen's home opener of the 1989 campaign.

"I think continued success and improvement out of the breast strokers and back strokers in particular," said Newcomb. "I think our sprinters swam well on Saturday, I want them to keep going. We're not keying on any one individual as far as who needs to swim fast to win."

Vermont is a young team having lost some key people to graduation, causing optimism for another UMass victory in this young season.

But Newcomb cautions, "We're going in as a team. I'm not definitely coming out and saying we're gonna win. One thing about swimming is it tends to be a little easier to predict because you can figure, its times are right down on paper.

"The individual sport as compared to basketball or football where teams can play way above themselves are harder to predict. In swimming, you can swim above yourself but you have a good idea what is going to happen in the end."

"This is another opportunity for us to swim in a competitive setting."

While UMass may be viewing this meet as just another easy win, en route to this weekends tilt with the University of Connecticut, you can bet that the University of Vermont is gearing up for today's meet with UMass.

Stranger things have happened, but if UMass is taking Vermont lightly, coach Newcomb's crew may be in for a very long and surprising afternoon today. Vermont is a young team, and nothing would start their season off better than an upset of the mighty Minutewomen in their own pool.

Look for coach Newcomb's squad to come out ready and possibly for a few UMass swimmers to break school records. This afternoon should prove to be a most interesting one, and barring any unforseen disaster, UMass should go into Saturday's meet with a 2-0 record.

Field hockey tabs NCAA invitation

For the 10th time in 11 years the University of Massachusetts field hockey team has been invited to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutewomen received word yesterday that they will play Boston University at B.U. in the first round on Sunday (1 p.m.). The winner of that game will play the defending national champion and this year's No. 1 seed in the tourney, Old Dominion, on Sunday at 1 p.m.

"I think it's as good a draw as anybody got," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Everybody's got to play against somebody good. There's no easy way into the tournament."

UMass tied B.U. in Boston, 0-0, on Oct. 25. The Minutewomen lost at ODU, 4-1, on Sept. 16 in their third game of the season.

"We played Old Dominion probably at the worst time we could have played them and we managed to stay tied at halftime," Hixon said. "I think our team is far better than we were then."

The rest of the tournament looks like this: The University of New Hampshire will play at Northeastern University on Saturday with the winner to play North Carolina.

In the Midwest at Iowa, Providence College will play the University of the Pacific with the winner playing Iowa.

Water polo waits for word on Easterns berth

The University of Massachusetts water polo team's split of four games over the past weekend has put its hopes for an Eastern Championships berth in jeopardy.

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team knows how to make life tough on coach Russ Yarworth. After splitting their four games this past weekend in the New England Championships at Harvard, the Minutemen find themselves on the bubble for an invitation to the Eastern Championships.

"I just don't know," said Yarworth when asked if he expected a berth in the Easterns. "We'll have to wait and see."

The Minutemen (12-9) were scheduled to find out last night if they received the invitation.

In the weekend opener, UMass expelled the Massachusetts Institute of Technology by a 10-5 count. UMass got a big fourth quarter (when it outscored the Engineers 4-0) to ensure the win. However, Yarworth was quick to point out he substituted freely, getting in as many players as possible.

"The game was never really in doubt," he said. "I wanted to play as many people as I could so we would be rested."

Goal scorers for UMass were:Scott Reed (3 goals), Jim Miller (2), as well as Scott Deluca, Craig Siegel, Alex Yelensky, Matt Buckley and Brian McIver, with one goal each.

Playing Harvard, Yarworth had some concerns going into the game.

"I had some reservations 'cause we beat them twice this year," he said. His fears were realized as Harvard sprinted out to a 6-0 halftime lead.

"They came out sky high and we dug ourselves a large hole."

The Minutemen showed some vigor in the third period, cutting the Harvard lead to 8-4. However, they could never muster enough consistent play to sieze the lead and faltered 10-5.

On Sunday, UMass tried for the fourth time to beat Brown University. And for the fourth time they came up short, dropping a 13-6 contest. Despite the loss, Yarworth felt UMass played well.

"We played tremendous, our best ball of the year," he said. "We made 'em play, we just ran out of steam."

UMass trailed at the end of every quarter (3-2, 8-5, 9-6, 13-6) yet the seven goal advantage is misleading. In the final period, Yarworth went primarily to reserves. Consequently, UMass was outscored 4-0.

"They were scoring because of our mental mistakes," said Yarworth. "Our man down defense was a little pourus."

It's not over till it's over in the Yankee Conference

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

One of these years, the Yankee Conference is going to have a clear-cut winner. None of this "parity" garbage.

We here at Notebook Central were pretty pleased when Maine and Villanova established themselves as the top two teams in the league, just as we had predicted on a steamy day in the Hub three months ago.

Then what happens? Along comes a gust of wind and sends our neat little house of cards flying.

Oh, it would have been so easy if Maine had just continued to bowl over everyone and everything in its sight. For the first time since '85, there would have been an undisputed heavyweight champion in the world of the Yankee Conference.

But everything has changed in the last two weeks, and there is probably a massive letter-writing campaign in the Pine Tree State right now equal to that of the great Sidd Finch debacle.

Up there with Clint Hurdle and Joe Charboneau, we have the Black Bears. Nearly invincible for two months, there was only one thing that could stop them. Yes, it was laid out right in front of our eyes in full color — the dreaded Sports Illustrated jinx.

OK, the loss to Delaware last week was acceptable. But there is no other possible explanation for losing to Boston University for their second consecutive setback.

So thanks to SI, we now have our work seriously cut out for us. We now have to figure out who the hell can still win this mess, and how.

Here goes, team-by-team scenarios. But don't hold us for this. Who knows. There could always be a big NCAA investigation that declares eight teams ineligible, and Richmond would wind up winning the thing by default. Well, maybe not. But most anything else is still possible.

Maine (6-2): It's all their fault. Nobody likes them anyway. Too cocky. Campus in the middle of nowhere. But at least the possibilities here are pretty simple.

The Bears are finished as far as conference games go. Thus, only BU (the only team with two losses to beat them) can oust them by winning its last two games. But that will be tough. In the end, someone will probably tie them with two losses, but the Bears will get the automatic NCAA bid.

Boston University (4-2): Only team that can unseat Maine. But the Terriers visit Connecticut and Villanova for the final two weeks. Definitely not a sure thing.

Now, this is where it gets interesting. BU holds the key to all of this, because it has to be involved in the proceedings in order to dump Maine, straight up or through some tedious 98-step tie-breaking procedure.

Villanova (4-2): Could finish tied, but can't possibly win it. Would have to beat BU, which would push Maine over the top. Still looks OK for an at-large bid (a chance to finish 8-3).

Connecticut (4-2): Same deal. Plays BU this weekend.
Another possible at-large with an 8-3 finish.

New Hampshire (4-2): Wins over Rhode Island and UMass, plus a pair of BU wins, would create a three-way tie for first between the 'Cats, the Terriers and the Bears. Put all three in a cage, and it would be a gruesome fight, but the YanCon doesn't work that way.

So we break out the ol' Yankee Conference by-laws and refer to Article XX, Section 2, which states, "In the case of a tie for the Conference championship, the first criterion used to break the tie will be head-to-head competition."

That's already been ruled out, so we continue. "The second criterion, considered collectively, will be overall record, strength of schedule and record vs. mutual opponents. The athletic directors of all non-participating institutions will serve as the tie-breaking committee."

Maine is 8-2 overall, while BU is 4-5 and New Hampshire 6-3. In that case, BU is as good as dead, so the folks on Commonwealth Avenue will be pulling for Rhody and UMass the next two weekends to knock off UNH and make it a two-team affair.

With strength of schedule, Maine could rue the day it scheduled a Division II doormat like Lock Haven. New Hampshire is the only team in which its three non-league games were all against Division I-AA teams. BU has played West Chester, a good D-II side, but a D-IIer nonetheless.

Mutual opponents don't go any farther than the other YC teams. Pity those poor ADs who have to figure this all out. In the

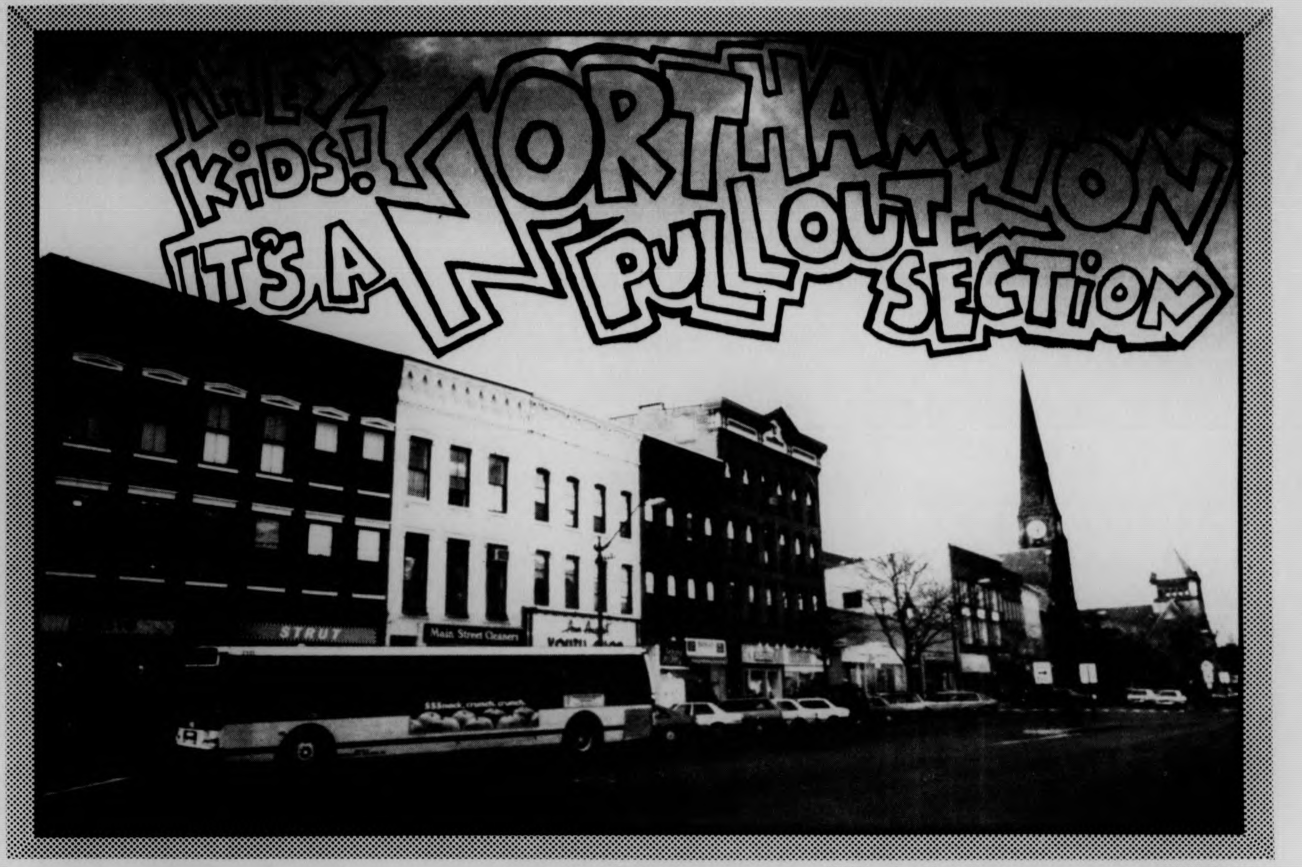
Football notebook

There will be a meeting of the Collegian sports staff this afternoon at 4 p.m. in the newsroom.

Beats for the winter sports season will be discussed at this time. If you are unable to attend, please contact Jim or George.



Who can pay attention to what's going on between Dinkins and Giuliani down in NYC when one of our very own politicians is wreaking so much havoc right on our doorstep.

WAY OUT FUN

It is only this cunning stunt of a career move that can explain the absence of Mass Culture, the last in a line of spunky youth culture mags in the Valley. It is not this vacuum that our humble fold-out intends to fill. After all, this is still the Collegian, and as members of its staff, we've long since learned to tone down our pretensions. (Almost — annoying Ed note.)

In the strictest sense, this is an advertising supplement, cleverly slipped into the pages, looking, smelling, reading just like a newspaper; but not quite a newspaper, because it has a specific purpose.

In our case, that purpose is to coax you into Northampton, which is ironic considering that there is nothing more distasteful to the Gotham drops who call Noho home than the thought of a horde of UMass students descending on their territory.

DA ARTS

And nothing tickles us as much as bringing this about, because underneath that Legoland facade Northampton offers pleasures that should be shared by all, and that's what we will be exploring in the following pages.

In 1851 the globally received opera star Jenny Lind came to Northampton and christened the hamlet 'The Paradise of America', a phrase that resonates still on the city's bumper stickers. If Jenny were to come back today and gaze upon the day-glo bauble boutique continental pastry CHECK OUT THE POTTERY earth-tone fabric and leather boot bagel majesty of modern day postFitzwillian Noho, her reaction wouldn't be different by a vowel.

MUSIC

As Venice has the Florian cafe, as Paris has Les Deux Magots bistro, as New York has the White Horse Tavern, Northampton has Bonducci's cafe. 'Big deal,' you may say, 'Amherst has one of those.' But the one in Northampton is twice, yes, twice as big, and the counterpersons have cooler haircuts. So there. But it would be a waste of printspace to let this degenerate into an intra-Valley squabble. And our advertisers might get angry with us, too.

— ANDRE BUSI

Pleasant St. Theater
NOW

one of the last free things

is the aesthetic wonder that is the PVTA 5 college bus service. To get to Northampton one should simply proceed to Haigas Mall at one of the close to three or four times every hour the bus arrives at that spot, just waiting to take you to the land of Oz.

Once there you can . . .well, that's what this is all about.

Suffice it to say that you should not be fooled, there are even some UMass folk in residence at this funny little double negative, carbon copy, miniturised Paris/Montreal/Hell. As Kafka had his Prague ("my little mother with claws") we have our, or someones, Northampton.

What else? It's a nice place, maybe a little too nice. No matter, to quote afore mentioned Mass Culture: "one of the coolest things about Northampton is It's a place where one can waste a lot of time and be socially acceptable doing it."

This "time wasting" is a valuable art, one the natives occasionally perfect. Joining them is rarely a disapointment and after a few years its not even 'them' anymore.

It's also way accessible (still the catch phrase). As accessible as clicking your heels and smelling the capucino and fish? Or waffles maybe.

Granted, it's silly stuff, but its easy to access. A few warnings: do not give to the Northampton Honor Court (try Jessies House if you care), do patronize Pulaski Park, mourn the passing of the Red Lion's and the Super Stop & Shop's ending the wonder that was 24 hour service, and do not take too much too seriously, especially your reading matter. Then again, don't swallow too much salt, it's bad for the blood, and that leads to the heart.

And, remember, you residents kind enough to have read thus far, today is the day. But voting with intelligence, compassion, understanding and vision should be a breeze. Enjoy.

taking from the beat to give something away

Few titles reflect the reality of a situation. Look at these headlines for instance.

"Back to the Public" is, however, a name that is more than backed-up by sincerity. Just over a year old, the organization has come as close to being an institution as something so young and non-profit could ever hope to be.

It all started one rainy day in September of 1988 when Kevin Keady, a young carpenter and musician, approached one Jeb Bailey, the owner of the Northampton and Amherst Bonduccis cafes'. He suggested that Mr. Bailey allow a stage to grace his Northampton premises upon which local performance artists of absolutely every kind could express themselves.

Starting out as a Monday and Wednesday night venture, with feature performer every other Wednesday, the situation didn't quite work for some irrelevant reason. And so, since the Spring of this year, "Back to the Public" has presented an open mike, alternating with a featured performer, every other Monday night.

So what do we have? A non-profit organization, pretty much composed of one man, Keady (who describes his position as being an "instigator."), that makes it possible for local artists to do whatever their thang might be to an ever growing audience at one of the most established (for better or worse) coffee houses in the area.

"It promotes creativity and personal growth as well as creating a sense of community,"Keady said.

So the idea is art for arts sake, rather than for money. A rare stance in today's world, even in the land of Oz. The only people making a profit are Mr. Bailey, those on stage (in experience) and those in the audience, for what is often some enriching, inspiring, or, at the least, entertainingly silly performing. All this for the price of a cup of coffee, or less.

Keady gets to lug, and at times rent, equipment, owing to the lack of a PA at Bonduccis, eat a free sandwich and bask in the glow of what is the closest anyone has come to creating a modern day negative, of sorts, of what one might expect the Beat movement to have been. Clanging coffee cups, curling cigarette smoke, that steamed milk machine rattling away, and a lone poet, using either words or a guitar, deeply involved in the increasingly rarefied art of of self expression.

"It's both a receptive and chaotic atmosphere. People are listening, they are attentive, but there's usually a lot going on. It's supportive," Keady said.

Recipients of this support have included folks such as Laura Wood, Janet Feld, Joe Keenan and John Cruz. That is, in the interest of shorter sentences, not to mention the presences of Rockin' Dave, the Herschlers Matt and Mark, Joe Thomas, Ray Mason, Rob Skelton and, lest we forget, The Supreme Dicks. Such musical thrills are peppered between people like you and . . . that person behind you.

"I'd like to see more stand up comedians and poets,"said the only man in these quotation marks (see picture). "I'd also like to see more people coming in from Amherst and other towns. Like any program I want to see this grow."

Which brings us to one of the main points of "Back to the Public": its' complete accessibility. "The open mike provides a forum for performance artists of any kind to express themselves; it's very accessible and the range of experience to inexperience differs greatly." Another point is that nobody gets turned away for anything other than time constraints (as in not signing up in time). Also, in the past year, there have been no reports of any egos having been smashed on the rocks of mediocre reception.

So why do this at Bonduccis? "Because it's so (that word again) accessible, so visible. 200 people walk by its' window every hour. It's definitely a coffee house." Fine.

Why are you doing this? "I think it's very important work, especially in a society that isn't supportive of the arts. It's a shame society doesn't place more importance on the promoting of creativity. Besides, the response has been great."

And what about the Beat connection. First off, "it's a totally uncensored mike. It's the spirit of the beat movement that inspired me, the place is right on the street and it's a spot where a lot of artists hang out anyway.

One more thing that might help to explain the Beat influence. Keady lived with Alan Ginsberg for a year and a half, acting as a caretaker for the great poets' farm at Cherry Valley in New York state. A non profit organization started by Ginsberg in order to to have poetry exchanges and to help struggling poets, the farm, and Ginsberg, seem to have a lot to do with the beat inspiration for both the aesthetic and the realization of "Back to the Public."

After all, you don't have anything, unless you give it away.

"It's freedom of speech at its' purest level," says Keady.

The next open mike will be held Monday night Nov. 20, sign-up is at 6.30 p.m. and performing is from 7 p.m. - 9 p.m. Monday Nov.13 will see a mystery feature performer.

some of the funkier fun to be found in fun city

For many at UMass, Northampton is an enigmatic metropolis on the other side of the river, so we gave cub reporter Andre Busi a bus schedule and a note pad and sent him over the Coolidge Bridge to brave the Connecticut's own Left Bank.

You're probably asking yourself why you would want to go to Northampton. After all, the stores are all the same as the ones in Amherst, and Route 9 is a pain in the ass. But Northampton is a city (they have the slums to prove it), a fact that the natives will always remind those who come from Amherst in search of bargains, adventure, relevance, etc. This means that Northampton has an underbelly that can offer offbeat amusements to those who are born daring and imaginative, or to those who are just plain bored.

The State Hospital. Since all institutional architecture looks the same, the empty maze of brick buildings and courtyards bears an eerie resemblance to an abandoned college campus, ideal for playing out sci-fi fantasies culled from the Twilight Zone (ie: the Day After; time is frozen; etc.). The Main House is a cross between the Hotel Northampton and Castle Dracula. Be warned, there is a state security force that can't allow anybody to enter the actual buildings, but persistent souls will find a way.

Smith College, one of the last colleges in the U.S. that still thinks of co-ed schooling the way Afrikaners think of integration, offers all the insular charm of a convent. Like most campuses, this one features loads of slow-zone thru-ways. For the truly desperate this is perfect for cruising, and in Northampton this activity is by no means limited to the male gender. The library is open to the public, good for perusing their phenomenal periodicals room, containing publications of every conceivable subject and language. For the truly funky it's an occasional forum for poetry readings.

Woolworth's is one of the last places in downtown Northampton where you can get a cup of coffee where the counter help is not reading Kierkegaard or vintage Life magazines. Since this nickle and dime enjoys the lowest rent on Main Street (due to a sheer freak of legal order), it's also a bargain basement of school supplies, toys, toiletries, candy and clothing (boasting an impressive selection of goldfish).

Look Park, located in Florence and reachable via the Northampton Bike Path, offers such diverse pleasures as paddle-boats, an unparalleled set of swings and monkey-bars, loads of picnic space located in the smurf-like majesty of the woods, and most important, the red choo-choo train. Going open top through the tunnel may not be Space Mountain, but there is an illicit thrill to it.

Public Art has always been vital in Northampton; the art galleries are in a class by themselves, as are the wall murals, and of course the Ann August facade has to be seen to be believed. But like most of art's radical departures, the most important painting is hiding right under the collective nose of Northampton. Those in the know by now have guessed that I'm talking about Garrett McArthy's untitled piece in the Friendly's on King St. This painting deserves credit if only because it goads our disbelief more than any contemporary art in the area. It shows the Five-College community on a few cubic yards of wall space by cleverly juxtaposing evocative images. We UMass-holes should take note of how our turf is presented. The entire campus is reduced to the library tower dropped in back of the quaint chapel, and in the conveniently adjacent pond sits a graceful swan. These are the same sort of highly selective viewpoints that made the campus look so inviting in all the pamphlets they sent us in high school.

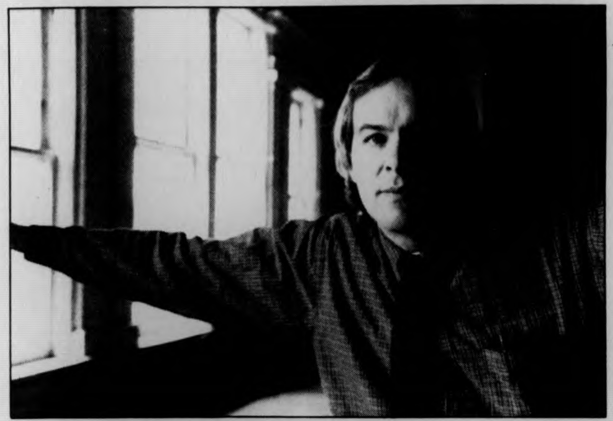
facing your fears with a smile

Across the street from the Academy of Music, nestled up on the third floor of the Sullivan Building, (which in turn snugly sits on the corner of Main and South Streets) is one of the most genuinely useful organizations in the Valley.

It is called the Northampton Center for the Arts and it's there for artists of any sort. That's not just artists with professional backgrounds and such, but anybody who thinks that they are artistic and has some work to prove it.

Stephen Calcagnino, [see photo] the director of the center, said in an interview with the Collegian last week, "We're here to service the artistic community," and continued by making a number of points conclusively proving that point.

The story begins in the fall of 1984. Before that the building had been a junior high school that was closed down. Due to public concern the building was turned into a public space and the Center for the Arts was born. "We knew from day one that we'd be successful because of the [large] population of artists in the area," Calcagnino said. "Since then we've helped to produce over 400 live performances, as well as mounting over 100 exhibits."



"People need a first [gig, showing] and we provide that need," Calcagnino said. The center provides space for every kind of artistic endeavor, including theater, dance, exhibitions of visual arts and "all kinds" of music, for both rehearsal space and performance. These spaces are available for one of the more reasonable studio rates in the area.

"We also have a slide directory for museums, whereby all pieces of art submitted go on file." What happens then is that museums and art galleries look through those files for prospective showings. All it seems to take to be in the files is having your art work on slide.

In addition, there's also a grant directory for people confused by all of that bureaucracy, and "a lot of internships done through UMass. We act as a satellite for UMass."

"We're trying to offer the area artists to the community, while helping the artists get known," Calcagnino said.

Sound too good to be true? Well, it is and it isn't. It's all true, but, "all arts organizations across the state have been hurt by cuts, so if there's ever been a time to support the arts, it's now," Calcagnino said.

But, "We rent our space to anyone that wants it; we're as loose as it gets," and "we're as accessible as you could hope."

music be the food of love

* * * * * *

Everyone in Northampton is something. Artist, writer, musician, aesthetic savant. At least everybody has such a claim. So, a little sorting is necessary. The dividing line here is whether or not a band has played a Northampton club, outside of an open mike. If anyone's been neglected. . . apologies.

Being a regularly performing band in town isn't so hard. It requires one of three things: talent, social connections or having been around in some form or another for years. A couple of these combined (preferably, but not necesserily, including the first), and you're in like Errol.

But column inches have suddenly become scarce and the thoughts of a leisurely, wordy ride through the land of Noho's (it had to be said) open mikes and local bands is going to have to be a rush job. Guilt sets in, as adjectives take over. And the advent of the evil that is info-tainment stains these pages of their innocence.

Downstairs at Sheehans Cafe is a basement called Deweys Pub, for absolutely no apparent reason whatsoever. A smoky, dense, booze sodden grotto, Deweys has played host to every local band worth mentioning. It's a spot that the better local bands gravitate towards — it's established and credible and generally fails to over charge.

The other spot is the basement of the Pearl St. Club, called, for no apparent reason, Ten Below. No contests, it's too late, but both establishments do cater to the young local bands by giving open mikes and then, if the band is good enough, giving them a night.

Pearl St. has WMUA personality Blue Bill hosting it's Tuesday night, year old "Blues Jam," an event that grew out of the L'oasis attraction of the same name. Blue Bill said "we try to keep it strictly blues." This has been a springboard for many local acts, including the deeply bluesy Uncle Martha, Gidget Goes to Hell and . . . others.

Sheehans plays host to local acts every Wednesday night in what the manager, Matt Dibenedetto, describes as being a "basic open mike; you can basically play anything you like." He also had some pleasant things to say about people I have the same sentiments for — "Uncle Martha, 5th Business, Ray Mason and Rockin' Dave, they all do wonderfully for us." He spoke of business, but people don't pay for bands that don't have a habit of consistently blowing you away.

Both open mikes have sign up at around 9 p.m. when the doors open. And both are accessible.

Another spot is the Iron Horse Cafe, a place more geared towards folk music, as the sponsor of their open mike, the Pioneer Valley Folklore Society, would indicate. It is held on the first Wednesday of every month, sign up is at 7 p.m. and a small donation is expected for the ever worthy PVSF. Ben Mitchell, who wowed the crowd last Wednesday, said that "it's the best place I've ever played an open mike for my kind of music." The Horse also has a comedy night on the last Wednesday of every month, sign up by 8 p.m.

Free Press, Check Please, The Sun Dogs, The Mess, Tabula Rasa, The Caroline Know and the ever heavy Plastic X are all owed apologies for the lack of drooling adjectives column space will allow (the Malarians got theirs in last week's loveable daily). All of the aforementioned are always playing locally.

Word has it that Tabula and Caroline will be gracing Sheehans next Monday, Nov. 13. Other than that one must return to the Arts page for info and fun filled features at the appropriate time.

SO LONG, FALL — The UMass leaf crew does their thing along Massachusetts Avenue last week.

Keverian says taxes needed to balance slashed budget

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts House will approve a budget-cutting package within a week, but taxes still will be needed to balance the state's budget, now about $730 million in the red, House Speaker George Keverian said yesterday.

Keverian said he expects dozens of amendments to be offered to the $401.4 million package approved by the House Ways and Means Committee when the bill reaches the House floor today.

"My guess is we will not be able to find sufficient cuts that we are willing to take responsibility for to balance this budget without new revenues," Keverian, D-Everett, said in an interview.

Meanwhile, two major church groups opposed a $7 million portion of the Ways and Means package, a provision that would allow major stores to open Sunday mornings. A cabinet secretary in the administration of Gov. Michael S. Duakais said the budget would devastate her agency.

The state's Sabbath laws now prohibit most big stores from opening before noon on Sundays.

The Massachusetts Council of Churches, a coalition of mainline Protestant churches, and the Massachusetts Catholic conference both asked legislators to reject the move.

"The current attempt to permit store openings on Sunday mornings would mark the final capitulation to unchecked consumerism," the Council said in a letter to lawmakers.

Gerald D'Avolio, lobbyist for the Catholic Conference, said he already has told House leaders the state's Roman

Bill may hike fees by $500

Student fees for next semester may increase by as much as $500, and out-of-state students will have to pay an estimated $3,000 in added tuition if a budget bill proposed by the Ways and Means committee is passed by the legislature in its current form, said Paul Page, vice chancellor for Administration and Finance.

In-state tuition would remain the same.

Page said out-of-state students do not vote for Massachusetts representatives; therefore, they will pro-

Students urged to ring reps

Only about 50 of the more than 25,000 students at the University of Massachusetts have used the Newman Center free phone lines to express opinions to the state legislators who control their educational fate.

David Golovner, the phone bank coordinator, said the phone bank began Friday and eight telephones will continue to be available all week from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

"All the students have to do is walk through the front door," he said. "We have listings of legislators by town, listings of which committees they serve on, and sug-

East Germany's Council of Ministers resigns

BERLIN (AP) — East Germany's government resigned yesterday amid growing nationwide unrest, a continuing exodus of thousands of its people and pleas from within the Communist Party for a sweeping top-level shakeup.

Also yesterday — one day after the government introduced a proposed law promising up to 30 days of travel to the West — a parliamentary committee rejected the measure and urged a new law allowing unrestricted stays abroad.

The 44-member Council of Ministers resigned jointly, government spokesman Wolfgang Meyer said. The cabinet, led by 75-year-old Premier Willi Stoph, has little power and implements policy made by the Communist Party's ruling Politburo. Stoph and several other ministers also are Politburo members.

"We appeal to the citizens who intend to leave our republic to reconsider their step once more. Our socialist fatherland needs everyone," said a statement issued by the outgoing cabinet.

Since early Saturday, more than 28,000 East Germans have fled to the West through neighboring Czechoslovakia. They arrived in West Germany yesterday at the rate of 120 an hour.

The government will remain in office until Parliament elects a new Council of Ministers, Meyer said. He did not say when such an election would occur. The party's Central Committee is to meet today to consider further changes.

Several Communist officials and three small parties allied with the Communmists have urged the Politburo itself to resign.

Leaders "should resign without any delay" to make way for a new Politburo and a new Cabinet that will implement reforms, said the East Berlin newspaper Junge Welt, organ of the country's Communist Youth organization. At least eight Politburo jobs were on the line at a meeting yesterday.

New party leader Egon Krenz has said five elderly Politburo members closely associated with former leader Erich Honecker will be replaced by the end of the week. Two other Politburo members lost their jobs Oct. 18 when Krenz took over.

The Politburo, which normally has 21 members, also discussed an "action program" that Krenz has said would contain sweeping political and economic reforms.

As the government resigned and the Politburo met, about 5,000 people marched in East Berlin to protest election fraud and urge free elections. Police did not intervene as the demonstrators challenged the Communists' monopoly on power and shouted, "All power to the people." On Monday, 750,000 demonstrators took to the streets in cities around the country, with about 500,000 in Leipzig alone.

East Germany's embattled leaders have been promising democratic reforms and eased travel restrictions in hopes of halting the growing unrest. But a draft allowing 30 days of travel to the West failed to curb discontent.

The constitutional committee of Parliament rejected the measure in its present form, just one day after it was published, the states-run news agency ADN said.

The panel recommended lifting the need for exit visas, separating travel regulations from emigration rules, clarifying the access to foreign currency for trips abroad, reconsidering the 30 day limit and charging grounds on which passports can be refused.

Drug phone poll to kick off today

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Beginning today, eight members of a sociology discussion group will randomly call about 1 percent of the University of Massachusetts student population to ask about their drug use, the project coordinator said.

Michel Kopko, an undergraduate member of the class, "Drugs and Society," said his group decided to survey students for their class project because drugs are "the hottest issue politically in the country right now."

"It is important to know the extent of drug use, and the habits and attitudes of UMass students," he said.

The group has not set out to prove any theories, just

UMass date rape survey presented

13 percent of women undergrads report having been raped

By KATERI WALSH

Thirteen percent of University of Massachusetts women responding to a recent survey said they have been raped since they came to the campus, according to results released yesterday at a regional conference on date rape.

"Sexual assault is a problem at UMass as it is at most colleges and universities across the country," said Patricia Barrows, coordinator of the Counselor/Advocate Program at UMass and a participant in the conference. "Colleges are a microcosm of society. This isn't just going on in college societies."

The survey, conducted during the spring semester, also reported that 36 percent of women had been coerced into having sex while 64 percent had experienced sexual offenses, which include harassment, battery, and forced penetration other than intercourse.

The survey sent questionnaires to a random sampling of 1,000 male and female undergraduate students. Forty-five percent of the women and 25 percent of the men responded to questions exploring sexual aggression between people who know each other.

While no men said that they had either raped or attempted to rape a woman, 17 and 18 percent, respectively, said they had committed sexual coercion and sexual offenses.

Barrows said applying this sample group's percentages to the general UMass population would mean 1,220 women have been raped, 913 have experienced attempted rape, 3,430 have experienced sexual coercion, and 6,130 have experienced sexual offenses.

Mary Koss, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Arizona College of Medicine, presented similar national Anti-gay reactions surface at Hampden exhibit

By AMIE FINKELSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Vandalism that is being called homophobic occured at Hampden Gallery this weekend, according to Paul Yager, assistant technical director of Residential Arts. The attack apparently was made in reaction to an exhibit at the gallery by a gay artist.

Anti-gay slurs were sprayed with shaving cream inside the adjoining Hampden Theater and on windows outside the gallery.

An exhibit by gay artist Cary Leibowitz was unveiled at the gallery Thursday. The attack occurred sometime between Friday evening and Saturday morning, said Bob Antil, associate director of Residential Arts.

The vandals, who are still unknown, unsuccessfully attempted to break into the gallery after they broke entered the theater, he said.

"They could have done a lot more," says Shawn Farley, assistant director for Residential Arts. "Someone obviously wanted to get their point across."

Prior to the attack, about 30 students acting in a hostile manner visited the exhibit on Friday evening, said gallery guard Laura Grigsby.

Also, one male student had come into the gallery, and asked hostile questions regarding the exhibit, Grisby said.

Grisby said the student asked her if she had set up the exhibit. When she suggested that he call the exhibit's curator, he left and returned after an hour with a camera. She asked him not to take pictures without the artist's consent, but he disregarded her.

Some reactions to the exhibit were homophobic.

"I think [the artist] is a f... psycho and I hope he dies," said one woman, who did not wish to be identified. "This is so disgusting. What the f... is this all doing here?"

Another woman remarked "Do you know how much money is being wasted with this? Gross."

"They didn't treat it fairly," said Grigsby. "They were just like 'what does this mean?' I told them that it was a self-portrait and should be looked upon as one whole piece of art. This is who he is, don't let one thing offend you and make you disregard everything else."

Eric Vieland, the exhibit's curator, left a sheet available to anyone who had questions about the exhibit. There was also a space for comments, among which included "YUK!!! Disgusting."

Vieland said he is upset with the critics' intolerance. "It's amazing how much hate people have towards others," he said. "We're dealing with a semi-controlled environment of an art gallery."

Vieland said the exhibit is funny. "There's so many jokes that Cary makes about himself. If people would just take the time and think about what they're seeing, they might laugh too. If they don't like [the exhibit], that's fine, but at least give it the time that art deserves," he said.

Farley said some people complain that the exhibit is a waste of taxpayers money.

Vieland said the show is worth the taxpayers' money.

"Millions of shows all over the country are supported and funded with taxpayers' money, many of which are of mediocre art," he said.

"That is a waste of the public's money. Cary's show, in the first week alone, has caused more people to sit and talk about their feelings toward homosexuality. It's forcing people to communicate and be involved with open-minded thinking. It's worth the taxpayers' money to expose yourself to a new idea," he said.

The show will run through Nov. 22.

SGA may revise constitution

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

More than 20 senators are expected to propose tonight to the Undergraduate Student Senate that a Constitutional Convention be held to submit a revised constitution to the Board of Trustees for ratification.

Howard Dreyfus, (Pierpont), one of the primary supporters of the motion, said, "It is ludicrous to me that we argue day in and day out over a constitution that doesn't exist."

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima said the Student Government Association never submitted a constitution to the Board of Trustees because "we had assurances in advance that we'd lose."

He said University General Council William Searson and the University President's Office would find several provisions inappropriate.

The provisions in question regard the Third World Caucus senate seats, the role of the student judiciary, and the student Bill of Rights, Nakajima said.

The constitution needs to be recognized by the Board of Trustees in order to give the SGA a binding force with the administration and acknowledge SGA procedures and policies, said Nakajima, who is the only SGA official recognized by the trustees.

He said the delegates elected to the convention would communicate with the Board of Trustees and Searson to produce a document that makes the SGA a legitimate body.

Nakajima said the proposal needs to be considered carefully because he doesn't want the constitution to be completely changed just to meet administrators demands.

"I would hate to see people rip up the constitution," he said."I fear that people would get into a major hashing out of the system and turn it upside down."

Student Attorney General Robert Fadel said, "The intent is good, but you can't plunge into something like this from one week to the next."

statistics in her keynote address.

Koss has spent 10 years conducting research on "hidden rape," or sexual aggression, and victimization among the general population. Her research is the subject of a book entitled I Never Called it Rape: The Ms. Report on Recognizing, Fighting, and Surviving Date and Acquaintance Rape.

Koss spoke of several "triggers" for rape, including pornography, alcohol and drugs, and societal attitudes.

"We have created for ourselves a culture in which women and minorities are clearly less powerful," she said.

She also named her "theories of vulnerability," which include provocative behavior, the specific situation involved, and whether the victim has had a previous traumatic experience. Koss said we need to avoid using these theories of vulnerability to blame the victim.

She used the example of drunkenness, which she said is often used to blame the woman in a rape situation.

"You're going to tell me that this comatose woman got herself raped?" she said.

She stressed placing the responsibility on men, saying, "It's a man's penis, and it's his responsibility where he puts it."

The survey, conducted by the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office at UMass, indicated that women who were raped on campus were more likely to turn to a friend or roommate then anyone else. Barrows emphasized the importance of campus education about date rape.

"It's very important to make sure that we educate [students] so that they can be informed and sensitive to their friends and roommates when they come to them for help," Barrows said.

to compile the data in statistical form, Kopko said. The data will be arranged by total numbers, by sex, and by year of graduation, he said.

The week-long survey, which consists of 50 objective questions, asks students about six categories of drugs: tobacco, alcohol, caffeine, marijuana, psychedelics, and cocaine. The group chose these substances because they consider them to be the most popularly used drugs, he said.

The survey also poses questions about student use of vitamins as well as prescription and over-the-counter drugs, he said.

The questioners will call student telephone numbers from the UMass student directory out of which the names have been ripped, he said. Some surveying may be done in person, if the parties agree, he said.

"We are very concerned that people understand that we're not connected with law enforcement," Kopko said of the survey, which takes about five minutes to answer.

"Living in a community I think we tend to have preconceived ideas on how like or not like each other we are," Kopko said. "I am always fascinated by survey information. There are surprises on how the fellow community people think about one thing or another."

Students gather on the steps of "the wall" near the Student Union Building to read, study and catch up with friends.

Students flock to the 'hippest' spot on campus

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Hundreds of students, weather permitting, lounge around the campus pond side of the Student Union every day. The reasons people flock there vary as much as their personalities.

"It's the most relaxing and entertaining place on campus; coming here is a great way to wind down," said Dennis Duberger, a senior English major who stopped to sit on the warm concrete on his way to work.

"I like to come here because I don't feel guilty about not studying, and no one else really does either," Duberger said, adding that, although the scenery is nice, he is attracted to the spot mainly because of the people who hang out there.

"In books I read about all types of interesting characters. Here I get to see them in action," he said. "It's real transient here, if you're talking to someone and the conversation dies you can just say it's time to go."

Some students gather at the wall to meet new people.

Rachael Jacobs, a sophomore French major and Chris October, a junior engineering major and self-described "hippy/capitalist," met at the Student Union and now visit the area several times a week.

"It's a hippy crowd, but it's easy to meet people. It's a great scene," October said.

Jacobs agreed. "It's easy to talk to people here," he said.

Both said the area is friendly, but they also have found some of the people to be distant.

"It's kind of hippy-cliquey. Some people here are snobs but most everyone you can talk to," October said.

Jacobs said since the same people gather at the wall it's easy to get to know them.

She said she finds it difficult to study at the wall, and that if she needs to study she goes to the Cape Cod Lounge.

However, Elyse Hempel, a junior English major, said the location is perfect for studying.

"It's a nice view, I get to see my friends and sit outside in the sun," she said. Hempel said she also likes the area because it reminds her of her home in Minnesota.

"There's so many different people here, it's something you could only have at a big place like this," she said. Hempel said her main reason for studying at the wall was for convenience.

Sheryl Baldwin, a University employee, said she doesn't sit at the wall often, but when she does it's only to catch some rays or to get work done. Baldwin said she worked at UMass over the summer and that she could detect that school was back in session by all the litter piling up.

"I came out here and there was litter everywhere. The students must not read those littering signs the University has put everywhere," she said.

Cleaning up an old act

N'hampton man staying sober after 21 blurry years

By COSMO MACERO, JR.
Collegian Staff

When Charlie K. was four years old, he had his first taste of alcohol. By the time he was eight, he was drinking regularly. Relatives turned him on to marijuana and LSD at age nine, and he soon developed habits that would stay with him for more than two decades.

Now, 26 years after that first sip of booze, Charlie (not his real name) is sober and drug free. Raised in Leominster, he now lives in Northampton, where he earns a living transporting retarded students to and from school. Charlie has been "clean" for nine months.

"I didn't think I could handle it [a job]," he said. "It's amazing. My skin doesn't feel like paste anymore. I can eat. I can go outside. I can actually talk to people."

Charlie traces the root of his problems to what he calls his dysfunctional childhood. Abuse at home played a part in the development of his addictive behavior, as did family and friends who made drugs available to him at an early age.

"We had relatives who were into drugs . . . and in addition, they were willing to give them to me," he said.

At age 10, Charlie said he was drinking and getting high daily. Though his parents rarely drank, they had a liberal attitude toward marijuana, and did not shy away from using it in the house, he said.

"You have to remember, this was the late 60s and early 70s. There certainly weren't any 'say no to drugs' campaigns."

Gifts of beer and wine that Charlie's parents received immediately became products for his consumption. Though he was caught in the act on occasion, Charlie was rarely punished for his drinking, he said.

> 'I was a perfectionist. I was the best at being a drinker, and I was a damn good drug addict too.'
> – Charlie K.

"My parents had this complete denial of the fact that I had a problem," he said. "They would ask, 'Did you drink this?' and I would say, 'Yeah.' Then that would be it."

No real close friends

Charlie attended public schools in Leominster before going to prep school in order to get accepted to an art college. It was in junior high that he realized he felt most comfortable with kids who were from broken homes.

"There were a lot of people I'd party with, but I had no real close friends . . . maybe one or two," he said.

"In school, you had your hoods, your jocks and your burnouts. I was somewhere between hood and burnout," he said. "We didn't care about anything but each other, and getting high."

While making only fair grades in school, Charlie took an avid interest in literature and the arts. It was then that he began likening himself to hopelessly drunk but amazingly talented authors like Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner.

"I wanted to be an alcoholic," he said. "I saw it as very romantic. All these great artists were always messed up, so I figured that was my place in life. I was a perfectionist. I was the best at being a drinker, and I was a damn good drug addict too."

Getting what he wanted

Charlie began attending the Museum of Fine Arts School in Boston when he was 18. Despite his substance abuse problems, his prep school teachers were able to motivate him enough to get accepted to the fine arts program, which Charlie contends is one of the few things at the time (other than liquor and drugs) that he actually cared about.

It was while living in Boston that Charlie first decided to seek treatment for his problems.

"Things were real bad then," he said. "I had been living at a bus station for a couple of weeks, and at first I thought it was pretty neat, drinking with winos . . . but then I realized I needed to get some help."

Charlie began treatment at a detox facility, and began attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings. While his intentions were good, he soon grew tired of the meetings, and the valium he was constantly given.

"I thought it was a joke. I wasn't ready for all that yet," he said. "I knew I had a problem, but I thought I could handle it."

Charlie said he then began to develop an acceptance for what he was.

"I was an alcoholic."

"There's an old saying, 'once you become a pickle, you can never be a cucumber again.'"

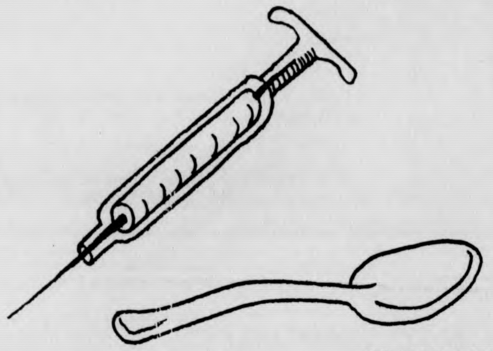
Getting what he wanted

Charlie's daily drug and alcohol use led to some unusual friendships.

"I wound up living with older women a few times," he said. "They were more than willing to take care of me . . . I was cute, I was fun to drink with, they were getting what they wanted and I was getting what I wanted . . . a warm place to sleep, and a place to drink."

In addition to his ever present bottle, Charlie made contacts with anyone who could supply him with a clean needle and a fix.

"I was really into the narcotics," he said. "Cocaine wasn't really too big then. I just saw it as something that allowed me to drink more. I used heroin. I liked demerol, percodan . . . pretty much anything I could break down and stick in my arm."



Collegian art by Andre Busi

During the time Charlie was heavily involved with drugs, he and his friends devised phony check and credit card schemes to support their habits. By the time he was in his early 20s, he was also experienced in various breaking and entering techniques. The most trouble Charlie has had with the law, however, is the long list of DWI convictions that he's racked up over the years.

"I got a lot of DWIs," he said. "I lost my license for awhile, and when I got it back, I decided I was never going to kill anybody . . . I got rid of my car. I was still going to drink."

While Charlie was pulling petty thefts to fund his drug use, his father would send him money. Fully aware of his son's addictions, the checks continued to get mailed.

"At that point, my father was doing the best he knew how."

Enough was enough

Nine months ago, after 21 years of constant drug and alcohol abuse, Charlie quit. He says he's been through so many treatment programs over the years, he can't remember half the names. For him, it was a matter of saying enough is enough.

"I came to the point where I was sick and tired of being sick," he said. "You have to be desperate enough. You have to want it enough."

"My relationship with my parents used to be very strained, now it's better than ever," he said. "I can visit them now, and they don't have to worry about what I'll do if they leave me alone in a room for 20 minutes."

Charlie plans on staying away from the things that made his life such a blur for so long. He wants to go back to school eventually, and return to the one thing he's always loved other than booze and narcotics — painting.

"I plan on holding this job, keeping myself clean and going back to school slowly," he said. "I want to get back to my painting."

Charlie K. is finally on a track with a destination in sight. He is confident in himself, and confident in the idea that if people want to help themselves they can.

"Everyone should be aware that if you're sick and tired of it, there's a choice. You don't have to die."

> 'If you're sick and tired of it, there's a choice. You don't have to die.'

bably have to pay the full cost of education next semester.

"It's tough for someone from out-of-state to convince a legislator they should not have to pay the full costs," he said.

Exactly how much the full cost of education is has not been determined yet, he said.

Page said raising student fees will cover only half of the total cuts and many other changes are possible.

"There will be a combination of fee increases, service cuts, layoffs and an increase in prices at University-owned stores," he said.

Page said the current version of the bill will cut government spending by about $200 million. After spending is cut to the bone, the Legislature will concentrate on a tax law to make up the remaining $530 million of the $730 million state deficit, he said.

Page said the bill is an attempt to do the following: cut $6.4 million from the $160 million UMass budget; end state contributions to University trust funds; charge out-of-state students the full costs of education; and reduce by 10 percent the "03" account that could result in layoffs of teaching assistants.

This "03" account is one of two accounts under which state workers are employed, including consultants and other temporary workers.

This is significant to UMass because, while temporary workers and state consultants are considered expendable by some legislators, the "03" account at UMass provides for teaching assistants, instructors, and student workers, which University administrators feel are necessary, Page said.

Page said state Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) is lobbying the legislature to change the wording in the bill to preserve the jobs of teaching assistants, instructors and students.

If we are not successful in clarifying the language, there may be a 20 percent reduction in the account next semester because the bill may apply retroactively, Page said.

Catholic bishops oppose the idea.

The United Food and Commercial Workers Union, the labor organization that represents many department store workers, also opposes the plan.

Keverian declined to take a position on the closing issue, saying he would leave it up to House members to decide the outcome.

Keverian reiterated that the plan to be debated by the House would deal only with the budget and with limited non-tax revenues, such as the Sunday openings and a move to raise $46 million by forcing beverage wholesalers to turn over to the state bottle and can deposits unclaimed by consumers.

A tax package will only be proposed after the Ways and Means plan clears the House and is acted upon by the Senate, he said.

He said there would be attempts by some House members to restore money already cut from some programs, but added he hoped it would be kept to a minimum.

Billy Weitzer, assistant vice chancellor for Student Affairs, said phone calls are the most effective means students can use to influence the legislature.

"Students should go to the Newman Center, find out who their representative is, and call," he said. "If a legislator checks in at the office during the budget debate tomorrow and he has 50 calls it will make a difference."

Leave Danny alone

During recent visits to the Philippines and South Korea, Dan Quayle was greeted by mobs burning him in effigy. Quayle must have been grateful for these receptions. Compared to the respect he gets in the United States, effigy-burning is a goodwill gesture.

In an August 1989 Washington Post/ABC News Poll, 52 percent of 1,022 respondents said Quayle is not qualified to take over the presidency if anything happens to Bush. According to 33 percent of those polled, Quayle is not worthy of the vice presidency either.

Darren Garnick

Why doesn't the American public trust Dan Quayle? And how did his political credibility plunge so quickly? After all, before Bush plucked him from Indiana, the only people who had even heard of him were either Hoosiers or C-SPAN addicts.

Dan Quayle has been branded by the media with the image of Vice President Airhead — rich, dumb, young and pretty. This image is so pervasive that it often overshadows Quayle's political positions as the focus of his critics.

During the 1988 presidential campaign, the media harped on Sen. Quayle's affluent background — as if his country-club upbringing was a rarity on Capitol Hill. His youth was also stressed as a campaign issue. Little Danny, it was implied, had the accumulated knowledge of an infant. Journalists dredged up a few "C's" from Quayle's college transcript as evidence.

Quayle gets by entirely on smiles and $100 bills, the media concluded. Some analysts made the ludicrous charge that Bush chose his running mate by physical appearance — i.e., Quayle's Robert Redford/Pat Sajak looks would attract women voters.

During the campaign, Quayle jokes oversaturated the late-night talkshow circuit, Democratic Party speeches and private conversations. The distinction between Quayle and the jokes became increasingly blurred, until the vice president's public appearances were considered comedy skits.

Recently, Penthouse magazine held an "Exactly How Dumb is Dan Quayle, Anyway?" contest. MTV followed up a few weeks ago with a "Top Bimbo of the 80s" phone-in election. The ballot:

A. Vanna White; B. Jessica Hahn; C. Dan Quayle; D. Brigette Nielsen; E. Rob Lowe.

MTV vee-jays chided these candidates for displaying "all style and no substance," a criticism MTV is hardly in a position to make. But this same shallow argument — Dan Quayle is all looks, no brains — is echoed everywhere.

The Boston Globe ran a story last May on Quayle's diplomatic trip to Singapore, where he discussed U.S. military policy with officials from Southeast Asian countries. Next to the story, the Globe printed a photo not of Quayle talking with government leaders, but one of Quayle playing golf.

While Quayle may have relaxed with a golf game after diplomatic talks, the Globe clearly intended to suggest that this was what he did all day. Dan Quayle is a media scapegoat, a case study in the myth of journalistic "objectivity."

Public figures are meant to be ridiculed, but when political humor replaces intelligent criticism completely, something is wrong. Face it, how many people can rattle off a Dan Quayle joke? Now, how many of those same people can cite Dan Quayle's positions on Civil Rights, Abortion or the Cold War?

I laughed when Lloyd (Constant Smirk) Bentsen thrashed Quayle in the debate. I laughed at the first few hundred Quayle jokes.

But there is such a thing as overkill. In terms of his looks and wealth, it is time to leave Danny alone.

See beyond Team proposal

A fraud is being perpetrated upon the people of this University, although the perpetrators have only the best intentions.

Petitions for a proposal sponsored by the Tax Equity Alliance of Massachusetts (TEAM) are now being circulated around the University by all the politically correct organizations, from unions to student government groups. This proposal, according to its promotional fliers, will "STOP the budget cuts at UMass."

Al Arpad

That statement is simply false.

The TEAM proposal is composed of tax law changes intended to make wealthy individuals and corporations pay a fairer share of taxes, with the additional money going to environmental programs, human services, local aid, and education.

That's something the Legislature should have done long ago, and in fact, they probably will have to do something like it before the 1990 elections, when the TEAM question will come before voters. In fact, many astute observers (including me) believe that the TEAM proposal isn't even aimed at next year's voters. The real intention is to increase the pressure now for a legislative tax package. I hope it works.

Members of the University community, however, should be aware of at least one additional fact: the TEAM proposal, no matter how it becomes law, won't solve any of the past, present or future budget problems here at UMass.

The TEAM proposal will generate between $300-400 million. That's only half of the current estimated state budget deficit for 1989, not including any previous budget cuts, and the new taxes won't take effect for at least a year after that.

And it's highly unlikely, given the past priorities of the Legislature, that public higher education will receive any significant share of whatever new money there is. All those other programs desperately need more money too, but anybody who wants to help the University should be looking at another proposal, one put out by former Chancellor of Higher Education James Collins.

Collins wants to add a penny to the sales tax and earmark the entire proceeds, about $400 million, just for education.

Critics have said that such a visible tax will never win at the polls, but I disagree.

I think the people of Massachusetts are tired of paying taxes and watching the money disappear into the giant toilet bowl we call the Statehouse. An idiot-proof new tax that can't be diverted from education should appeal to the vast majority of citizens who would like to see the middlemen and women who make up the state Legislature cut out of the picture entirely.

So go ahead and support the TEAM proposal, but with only two weeks left until the deadline for petition signatures, the proposal that could really "STOP the budget cuts at UMass" might not even get on the ballot.

Or, if you want to help, call 1-800-443-4050. Soon.

Problems in our own backyard

Motivation is an incentive which helps us to achieve our goals, the key factor to winning the game — the game of real life. Winning is a state of mind.

Let's take a look at the UMass Men's Rugby Team. UMass played against Amherst College this weekend. We won, why?

Try to forget the tangible reasons why we won: strength, stamina, athletic ability. I suggest there were other reasons behind our victory over Amherst College.

Presently, Amherst College is lobbying the legislature to cut state funding to public higher education. Yet, its students use our Health Services. Amherst College students take UMass courses to fill their upper-level requirements, but their parents don't want their taxes raised.

Knowing this, I would have to conclude that UMass did not go to Amherst College expecting to win a rugby game. No, they went to Amherst College to fight a losing war. The rugby team won their battle, killing Amherst College. Maybe they wanted to give them a chance to use UMass Health Services, to see how much they need it.

Now it is up to the rest of UMass, to defeat our enemy — budget cuts. Take a look at how cuts are affecting us here in Amherst — at problems in the immediate area, in our own backyard.

Civility Week is an established event at UMass that examines racism, sexism, homophobia, anti-Semitism and other discriminatory actions or beliefs.

What did you think about this year's Civility Week? Is one necessary? Does it accomplish anything? Do you think one week is too much (or too little) to devote to civility?

Put aside differences and focus on the main issue

This university desperately needs organized, focused and immediate action in order to oppose the massive budget cuts that would decimate the state of higher education.

Politicians are in the business of controlling and directing money and resources. That's the job that we, the voters of society, put them there to do. They will, like any other force in the universe, follow the path of least resistance.

The problem boils down to awareness and priorities. We must make ourselves, the people of the Commonwealth, the business community and the government aware of the pervasive effect that the quality of higher education has on our daily lives, both now and in the future.

The immediate and local repercussions of the budget cuts can be readily seen in the loss of quality faculty, fewer courses and services, diminished enrollment and increased tuition fees.

But what about the long-term effects? How will this affect people and businesses outside of academia? Do the corporations and factories realize that their future is strongly tied into ours? Will they want to stay in Massachusetts if the educational system cannot support their needs? Do the common citizens (or even our own families and friends) grasp the magnitude of this issue?

I feel that a majority of voters, if properly informed, would choose education as a priority of the Commonwealth. We stand at the edge of our demise. If the University crumbles before our very eyes, it is our fault, no one else's!

We must act now. The administration, faculty, students and university employees must join together to form a unified front that could organize and maximize a concerted effort.

John Patrick Musulin

We must put aside our differences and focus on the main issue of establishing higher education as a priority and soliciting the necessary funding to support a competitive university system. If we try to do everything all at once, we will fail. By carrying the excess baggage of Defense Department-funded research, racial tensions, minority services, etc., we run the risk of clouding the main issue of funding.

These issues are certainly very important to the campus community, and if called upon, we should respond appropriately. However, these are problems that can be solved at the "campus level." Let's get the money first, then some of the strain may be lifted and we can approach these issues in our own backyard.

The most dangerous and powerful tactic of the opposition will be to "divide and conquer." They will seek to cloud the issue, destroy our strength in unity and essentially tire out and distract any support we may gather. We can't let this happen. We must stick together.

This problem is urgent. It took generations to establish UMass as one of the leaders in higher education in this country and the world. It would only take a year or two to abandon it to mediocrity. We must act now.

The key to successful opposition to the proposed budget cuts will be a widespread and unified effort directed by strong, effective leadership. The infrastructure of the University is inherently conducive to our needs.

I challenge Chancellor Duffey to take the initiative and work with the Leadership Coalition towards a unified opposition to the budget cuts. I also challenge the students of this University to take the time and make the effort to support the Leadership Coalition and the activities that they organize.

We must act now. There is no tomorrow. Register to vote, notify your friends and families, harass your legislator, attend the rally, fight for your rights and take it to the streets!

Woody Allen commits the crime of the year

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

Brilliantly conceived and executed, Woody Allen's Crimes and Misdemeanors is unlike anything he has ever done before and, in consequence, is his most serious and socially important film.

The film parallels the lives of an opthamologist played by Martin Landau and a small-time documentary filmmaker played by Allen.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Both have marital problems of varying degrees. Allen's is emotionless and empty, leaving him to fall for Mia Farrow, a small-time producer who seems to be the right woman for him. Landau is secure in a loving marriage, but engages in a two-year fling with Anjelica Huston anyway. Landau's immoral motivation is the crime, while Allen's pursuit of Farrow seems more justifiable, and hence only a misdemeanor.

The story primarily focuses on the Landau character. When he reneges on his promise to Huston to leave his wife, she threatens to blow the whistle on the affair. Huston simply wants the truth to come out so no one else gets hurt. Feeling the heat, Landau pleads with her and we bend to his side of the case. Allen challenges us to vindicate Landau. Huston could ruin his life by exposing his willful crimes, yet we feel he deserves better than such a disgrace; we empathize with his dilemma. In today's society, such a predicament is so common we see ourselves in the same bind — we can relate indirectly to his suffering. We seem to relate wealth and social position with justice, ignoring any moral implications involved.

Joanna Gleason and Alan Alda in "Crimes and Misdemeaners"

Landau feels he has no other choice but to have his gangster brother kill her. Guilt-ridden, Landau turns to his religious upbringing for the first time since being spiritually raped by his wealth and social position. His shallowness is manifested in his sickening self-interest, calling upon his forgotten faith at a time when it fits his needs. But Landau finds that faith can't be sought after like a lost dog; it must be ingrained in the individual to have meaning. When he admits, "God is a luxury I can't afford," we know he is gone, a victim swallowed by the opulent facade of an empty existence.

Allen's character never resorts to such drastic means. His nemesis is his brother-in-law, a loudmouth sitcom producer played by Alan Alda. Alda steals Farrow

A field trip Mom wouldn't approve of

By AMIE FINKELSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Remember when you were nine or 10, and once a year, usually come springtime, you and your buddies were stuffed into big, black striped, yellow school buses ("only two to a seat.") and trucked to history museums, children's theater and amusement parks, and if you were lucky, a quick stop at Mickey D's? You had your permission slip signed two weeks early, and the best was knowing you were not going to school — you were going to play hooky and no one was going to force you to clap erasers for 16 hours at 3:30 p.m. for punishment.

A hundred bottles of beer on the wall. . .

Field trips. Days to remember. Are we actually old enough to say "the good old days?"

Keep your hands inside the bus, young man.

The folks at Residential Arts in Southwest Residential Area say so. And to help us get a hold of yesteryear, they have contracted as part of the Outer Limits series, P.S. 122 Field Trips — The Touring Project of Performance Space 122 to perform Nov. 8 and 9 at Hampden Theater.

Sit in your seat. No standing on the bus.

Stretching your boundaries of sight and sound, P.S. 122 Feild Trips will feature artists from around the country, breaking all the rules of theatrical genre. From dance to theater to cabaret, stand-up comedy, performance art and video/film, this troupe of individuals will give an unexpected twist to the great American tradition of vaudeville.

Field trips were never like this.

These artists of P.S. 122, an arts center carved out of a former school building in the East Village of New York City, repackage our societal obsessions at human scale and present them to us with a minimum of technological hoopla. The line-up for Hampden Theater includes Mark Anderson (writer/performer), Mimi Goese (dancer), Dance Noise (Anne Lobst and Lucy Sexton) performance art with text, Guy Yarden (violinist a la Jimi Hendrix), and an experimental film created by Ruth Peyser.

Don't forget to stay in twos.

Field Trips has been described as ". . .unexpected; it's not 'this is from New York — so stand back and be afraid of art.' Its not high art. You don't have to read a million books on performance art. You can just see it on it's own terms."

Don't separate from the group.

P.S. 122 is considered to be "performance art" because of the slanted angle taken by the artists. Performance art becomes universal when it is presented in an accessible tone. The language and imagery created by these artists challenges traditions while hitting the audience with hard core honesty. The audience will not be spoon-fed the material, instead they can choose to take from it what they want.

Stick with your partner

So pack your brown bag full of goodies (don't forget the Ring Dings) and meet your buddies. Play some hooky. And if the nostalgia is beyond your control, we'll get you some erasers.

P.S. 122 Feild Trips. Your teachers simply would not approve.

Both performances of P.S. 122 begin at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

It's easy being green

By KAREN PLACZEK
Collegian Correspondent

Trying to classify a band that can ignite a Husker Du tune and then follow it up with the Beatles is about as easy as walking your dog — on the New York thruway. Posed with the task, vocalist Coley Jellinghaus deemed Green Eyes "as rocking as you can get without drums and bass — and then some."

Formed in the fall of 1988, this three man band comprised of UMass students Jellinghaus, Nic Nyhan and Todd Schaffer is slated to play the Hatch tonight, opening for local reggae favorites, New Horizon.

Including in their set mostly original arrangements, their unique twist to cover tunes reveals a distinctive strength in depth. Bending the traditional sound of the Police's "So Lonely," slowing it down and supplementing it with additional harmonica, Green Eyes' version definitely rivals the original.

Other cover songs such as the Husker Du tune from which the threesome derives its name, as well as "Rock and Roll" by the Velvet Underground features an impressive electric guitar solo by Schaffer. Explained acoustic guitarist Nyhan, "We take the edge off certain hardcore songs and make them more palatable."

But the band's true inventiveness shines through in their own creations like "Pretties," "Egg," "Cigarette Song" and "Bad News."

Written by Nyhan three hours before an exam, "Bad News" captures the essence of the band's talent. "Egg" leans to the more brash side of the groups diversity while "Cigarette Song" and "Pretties" maintain a more resonant quality.

The combination of Green Eyes' use of harmonica, electric and acoustic guitars and tambourine certainly makes for a sound intrinsically theirs, and with a little fine polishing, a sound that should be heard a great deal more.

Movies that explore the gay community

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

It is Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Awareness Week. It is a time for people to learn about their own sexuality and that of others. One creative way to do this is through video. Movies have helped people come to terms with their own sexuality or the differing sexuality of friends and family. Here are some of the better ones.

Torch Song Trilogy — In Harvey Fienstein's comedy, Arnold Beckoff (played by Fienstein) is an introspective female impersonator who yearns for love and attention. Matthew Broderick, against the wishes of his agent, also stars.

Cruising — Directed by William (The Exorcist) Friedkin, this violently graphic movie stars Al Pacino in yet another brilliant role as a gay detective tracking down a killer in a homosexual community.

The Boys in the Band — Another Friedkin film. Released in 1970, this was one of the first films to openly deal with homosexuality. In it, nine men get together for a birthday party and end up exposing their most personal life stories. It ends up that eight of the men are gay.

Lianna — Written and directed by John Sayles, this wonderful movie examines an unhappy housewife (Linda Griffiths) who realizes she's a lesbian. Her struggles to come to grips with the situation, and the reactions of her friends are remarkably realistic and often humorous. The scene where she confronts herself in front of the mirror is especially funny.

Parting Glances — Rock star Nick (Steve Buscemi) realizes he is dying of AIDS. The movie then focuses on the effect this has on Nick's estranged lover, played by Richard Ganoung. Although a very sobering topic, the movie also examines the gay social scene and includes many light moments. Songs by Bronski Beat help move the film along.

My Beautiful Launderette — A movie that takes on racism and sexism is one that you would expect to be very heavy handed. But director Stephen Frears adds enough comedic touches to make this a marvelous movie about human relations.

Personal Best — A brilliantly blunt movie about the lives of two Olympic hopefuls who are friends, teammates and lovers. Mariel Hemingway and Patrice Donnelly give stunning performances.

Prick Up Your Ears — A story of the life of playwright Joe Orton. This gruesome black comedy examines his rise to fame and his relationship with Kenneth Halliwell. It will shock you, surprise you, make you laugh and make you cry.

Maurice — This small gem of a film is based on E.M. Forster's semi-autobigraphical novel. It depicts the love of a middle-class college student for an aristocratic classmate.

Ode to Billy Joe — Starring Robby Benson, this is a wonderful coming of age film about a boy who doubts his sexual orientation. It gives an explanation as to why Billy Joe of the Bobbie Gentry song jumped off the Talachi Bridge.

Colvin returns home triumphantly

Shawn Colvin
Iron Horse
Monday, Nov. 6

REVIEW

On Monday night the Iron Horse welcomed home one of its favorite family members, CBS recording artist Shawn Colvin. It is obvious that Horse owner Jordi Herold, whom she acknowledges on her album, took pleasure and pride in introducing Colvin, who first appeared at the Northampton cafe in 1983.

Since that time she has labored with love at the craft she adores and attained some lofty goals: playing at the Newport and Philadelphia Folk Festivals, touring Europe as a vocalist with Suzanne Vega and, of course, signing with a major label.

Colvin's just released first album Steady On is a haunting, emotional 10-song opus in which she weaves poignant tales of family, romance and the open road. With the backing of a full band under direction of longtime collaborator Jon Leventhal, and including some of New York City's most respected and sought after players, these songs assume a vivid, irresistible, full-bodied texture.

However, Colvin painted these "journals with rhythms" in an entirely different spectrum alone with one guitar and one voice. She strode onto the sparse stage to an enthusiastic ovation. The pure plaintive power of her painful admissions enthralled a large, late night legion of her admirers, who listened engrossed as if her experiences were their own. If Sting is "King of Pain," then Colvin is certainly a candidate to share that throne.

The South Dakota born, New York-based bard gestured amiably with her audience, although she tended to be self-effacing. Yet, when she commenced to pick guitar and vocalize, she summoned another entity, a deeper spirit.

Her 80-minute, two encore show consisted of 17 songs: seven originals, six off her new album and one unreleased, and 10 covers, including selections from Simon and Garfunkel, the Police and John Hiatt. At the outset her voice was husky, dark and breathy, but as the concert progressed, it expanded and soared.

After years of honing her love laments before small crowds, Shawn Colvin's star is ascending.

Classical thrills

By PAMELA PERRAULT
Collegian Correspondent

The under-capacity crowd at the Smith College John M. Greene Hall Auditorium received its dose of culture for the week on Monday evening. The pieces presented by music director Dennis Burkh and his Five-College Orchestra ranged from a New England premiere of Sinfonia Preclassica, Op. 44 by Johann Nepomuk David to the Overture of the opera Fidelio, Op. 726 by Beethoven.

The 23 members of the core ensemble opened the performance. The David piece was floating, particularly because of the flute's role. Violins were played with vigor at times with marked dissonance. The effect was eardrum puncturing, yet pleasant.

ROOM CHOOSING PROCESS
For Spring 1990

PLEASE READ CAREFULLY: IMPORTANT INFORMATION

RESERVING YOUR CURRENT ASSIGNMENT

If you intend to keep your present residence hall assignment, personally sign up with the staff on duty Tuesday evening, November 14.
THE ONLY TIME TO RESERVE YOUR CURRENT ROOM IS TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 14.

CHANGING YOUR ROOM OR HALL

If you wish to move to another room in the same residence hall, you must sign up with the staff on duty Wednesday evening, November 15. All room changes will be determined by your seniority.
THE ONLY TIME TO SIGN UP FOR A NEW ROOM IN YOUR CURRENT HALL IS WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 15.
If you wish to move to another residence hall, you must complete a Housing Preference Form. DEADLINE FOR RETURNING HOUSING PREFERENCE FORMS TO THE HOUSING ASSIGNMENT OFFICE IS WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

IF YOU WANT TO KEEP YOUR CURRENT RESIDENCE HALL ASSIGNMENT WHILE ALSO SUBMITING A PREFERENCE FORM YOU MUST DO THE FOLLOWING:

1. Sign up for the same room on Tuesday evening, November 14, or a new room on Wednesday evening, November 15.
2. Fill out a Preference Form. On the Preference Form, in the lower right hand corner, is a box you must "check" if you wish to be returned to your current residence hall if your requested residence hall or area choices cannot be met.

YOUR OLD RESIDENCE HALL ASSIGNMENT IS GUARANTEED ONLY IF YOU DO BOTH STEPS.

ROOMMATE REQUESTS

If you wish to move to another residence hall to room with a student already assigned to that residence hall, you must together complete a ROOMMATE REQUEST FORM.
DEADLINE FOR RETURNING ROOMMATE REQUEST FORMS TO THE HOUSING ASSIGNMENT OFFICE IS THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

If you wish to become roommates with a student in a residence hall to which neither of you is currently assigned, you must each complete a Housing Preference Form. These forms should be identical, (with the exception of the "check" box) and stapled together.
DEADLINE FOR RETURNING HOUSING PREFERENCE FORMS IS WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

DIDN'T GET THE ROOM YOU WANTED?

If, during the regular Room Choosing period, you were unable to secure a particular type of accommodation (a particular single or double room), please contact the Housing Assignment Office to fill out a blue In-House Room Request Form. Rooms that become available during Intersession will be assigned, according to seniority, to those residents who filled out this form and returned it to the Housing Assignment Office.

PAY FEE BILL BY DUE DATE

Your Spring 1990 fee bill will be mailed to you at home in early December. If complete payment of this bill is not received by the January 5, 1990, Due Date, your assignment for the Spring semester may be cancelled. Be aware of this important obligation.

OTHER OBLIGATIONS

In addition to properly completing room choosing, all residents are required to remain in good standing with the University at all times. Being withdrawn for any reason after the end of the semester may automatically cancel your assignment. Check to make sure you do not owe any fees to the Bursar BEFORE you leave for intersession.

QUESTIONS?

If you still have questions about the Room Choosing process, please contact the Housing Assignment Office (545-2100), 235 Whitmore. Thank you.

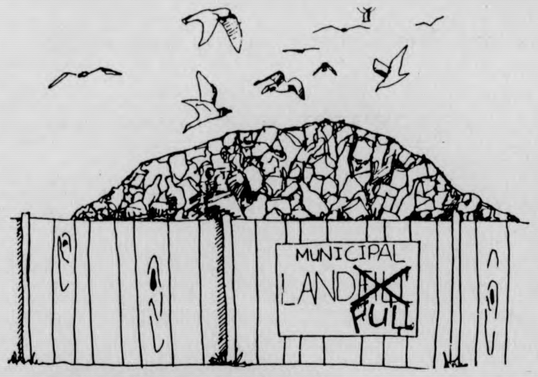
Turn your old paper into good news.

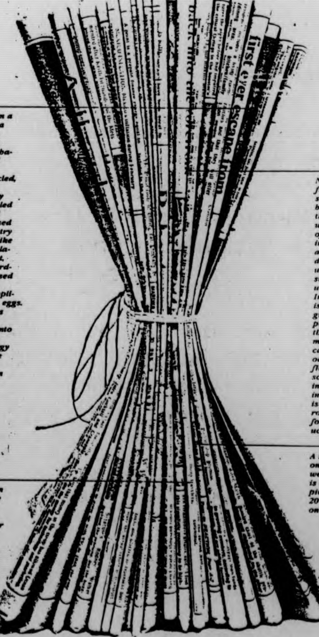


-NEWSPAPER

Recycle this newspaper

Every time we open a newspaper, write a check, reach for a Kleenex, or light a match, we are probably using recycled paper. Almost all paper can be recycled, and much of the paper we use every day contains recycled fiber. Our recycled newspapers are used by the paper industry to make products like cellulose fiber insulation, new newsprint, and cardboard. Cardboard, in turn, is used to make boxes for everything from appliances to shoes and eggs. Recycling conserves the energy and resources that go into making new paper. Up to 65% less energy is required to make new paper from recycled paper than from virgin wood fiber.

Every day, American businesses generate enough paper to circle the globe at least 40 times. Paper makes up 40% by weight of all the household trash we throw away, and at least 1/4 of this is newspaper.



Newsprint is made from wood pulp in the same way that a wasp builds its nest. First, the wasp feeds on wood, its main source of food, and grinds it into fibers. These fibers are then chemically digested to produce a wood-pulp like substance which the wasp uses to build its nest. In the same way, paper is recycled by first grinding it into small pieces and mixing these with water. This mixture is mechanically beaten into an oatmeal-like pulp and filtered through huge screens. The remaining fibers are pressed into sheets, dried, finished, and placed on rolls to be used again for new paper products.

A stack of newspapers only four feet high weighs 100 pounds and is equivalent to a 12-ft. pine tree. We can save 20 trees by recycling one ton of paper.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Employment affairs could be affected by developments beyond your control, but the end results are favorable. A letter or telephone call makes you happy. Settle your differences with loved one.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Mate or partner is quietly ambitious. Discuss your concerns openly to eliminate future career vs. home conflicts. A youngster is eager to take on new challenges. Loosen the apron strings.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): A career change is on the horizon for those dissatisfied with their current progress. A longtime relationship could end abruptly. The break-up proves less painful than anticipated.

CANCER(June 1-July 22): A family celebration must be carefully planned in order to keep expenses down and avoid misunderstandings. A coworker of the opposite sex is sympathetic to your mood. Spend a quiet evening relaxing at home.

LEO(July 3-Aug. 22): Things are starting to turn around for you. Your children are a source of great joy and pride. You should be in high spirits. Good friends add an upbeat note. Romance moves into high gear.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A career decision grows out of discussions with a trusted adviser. Excessive modesty can hinder career growth. Postpone shopping for expensive items. A blind date could be a pleasant surprise.

LIBRA(Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Get your personal paperwork and banking affairs in better order. It will save you time later on. An admiring family member congratulates you on a recent success. Accept any compliments with good grace.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your ingenuity will make this a productive day at work. Do not count on receiving too much cooperation from your coworkers, however. Your loved ones never seemed dearer. Do not spoil them!

SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A few kind words or good deeds can turn a dull day into a resplendent one. Anything that is done with love bears a special trademark. Improving communication with your mate is essential.

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Recommendations from experts in their fields should be accepted. Be suspicious of get-rich-quick schemes. Lerning new technical skills will boost your earning power. Enroll in classes.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your financial and emotional interests may be linked, creating domestic tension. Clear up misunderstanding soon. Overseas news will delight you. An old romance can be rekindled.

PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): Resist an urge to gamble. Success will mean nothing to you if you abandon your high ideals. Does a new venture sound strictly aboveboard? If not, drop the idea. Other opportunities will arise.

string bassist and UMass professor Salvatore Macchia, performed solos during Bottesini's Grand Duo Concertante for Violin, String Bass, and Orchestra. The violin solo loftily paraded to reach a piercing pinnacle amongst the orchestra's harmony.

Beethoven's Overture to the Opera Fidelio needed to be heard and seen to be fully appreciated. The string section provided a scene much like that of a seashore. Bows undulated like waves lapping at an eroding shoreline. Fingers climbed up the neck of the violins to provide the necessary crescendo that kept heads swaying.

out from under Allen, with his ability to quote Emily Dickinson with flawless eloquence. Alda is Allen's nightmare of the 80s personified — a bombastic ass who uses his immeasurable talent for all the wrong reasons. When Allen is hired by Alda to shoot a documentary of his life, Allen edits in shots of Mussolini and Mr. Ed juxtaposed with shots of Alda. It's a hilarious moment, but it carries a strong message — we're living in a decade of two-faced morality where the bad guy wins, and religion is reduced to a matter of mere convenience.

Crimes and Misdemeanors is a strong statement that is often disturbing to watch. This is a society where wealth and power pass as adequate substitutes for the human soul. Alda's character says that comedy is both tragedy and time. What's tragedy for today becomes material for Johnny Carson's monologue tomorrow night. Such is the theme for a decade where the crimes of a Jim Bakker become parodied rather than chastized.

Crimes and Misdemeanors captures the moral decay of a society that has given birth to a generation of villains and anti-heroes that have conveniently blurred the distinction between right and wrong. It's strong stuff handled by one of the greatest filmmakers of our time.

Sorry Spike, Crimes and Misdemeanors is the year's best picture so far.

Volleyball tipped by CCSU

Blue Devils fired up in final match, get revenge for earlier loss

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

One of the worst fears of a coach is to play a team that really has something going for it, i.e. playing its final home game of the season and wanting to leave on a good note.

Even more dangerous is when you've already beaten that team once in that season, only adding kerosene to the fire that is being kindled on the other side.

Those two ingredients came together last night to burn the University of Massachusetts volleyball team, which got the rug pulled out from under it by an improved Central Connecticut squad in a four-set match at New Britain, Conn.

"Central played extremely well," said UMass coach Carol Ford. "They've improved over the last time we played them. This was their last match and they were just out of their minds."

The Minutewomen had every reason to be confident going in, having knocked off the Blue Devils in straight sets on Oct. 18 at Totman Gym. That was the last win in this downer of a season for UMass, which fell to 2-26 with last night's setback.

"I'm not very happy with the way we played," Ford said. "No one was outstanding. It's almost like we were out of sync. Central doesn't have a good record either, but they didn't want to lose. They had a lot of people in the stands."

Central Connecticut set the tone for the evening from the opening serve, flying all over the place en route to a 15-7 first-set win.

"You could tell during warm-ups, they were as high as a kite," Ford said. "You could tell they could do no wrong."

Leader of that near-flawless, possessed-play brigade was senior Lisa Douglas, who was playing in her final collegiate match. Douglas, who was the lone glimmer in the Devils' loss here a month ago, was bright and clear last night, outshining the Minutewomen from the get-go.

"Lisa Douglas was almost unstoppable," Ford said. "She was hitting from the front and from the back. We couldn't beat them."

UMass was able to rebound in the second game, still pushed to the limit by the inspired hosts, but able to come away with a 15-13 victory to even the match.

"We were cold in the first game. In the second they played good but we played really well," Ford said.

But that disappeared in the final two games, CCSU rolling up wins, 15-13 and 15-7 to end the season with a bang.

"In the fourth our game just fell apart. We weren't hitting," Ford said.

Ford said that, with the heavy partisan crowd, the officials became a factor, and though their calls weren't biased in either direction, the constant barbs from the fans only served to pump the Blue Devils up.

"It was a typical last home match," Ford said. "Their technical improvement was really outstanding from the last time we saw them."

Bright spots for UMass included the play of Nancy Sullivan, Julieta Santiago and Sharon Panoff.

"They had their bright moments in hitting, digs and blocking," Ford said. "But they also made errors, too. Real common, stupid errors that we shouldn't be making."

All that remains for the Minutewomen is their final match Tuesday against Northeastern at Totman Gym. Ford and her troops can only hope that this time, the shoe will be on the other foot, and the Totman crowd can help UMass end an otherwise frustrating 1989 on a positive note.

Top 10 list: Why Buffs are the best

Ouch! It pains me to one, admit this and two, print it, but here goes. Colorado is the team to cheer for to win the national championship. Being the resident campus Sooner-ologist it goes against everything I stand for to root on an opposing Big 3, er, I mean Big 8 team; but I cannot deny the facts. There are at least 10 reasons to pull for CU.

1. Darien Hagen: The man deserves the Heisman. More importantly he deserves it over front-runner Tony Rice. Young Darien has 794 yards and 12 touchdowns on the ground and 815 yards and three touchdowns through the air. While he was leading Colorado past Nebraska on Saturday, Rice was throwing more interceptions (2) than completions (1) against Navy.

John Steven Marple

2. Jeff Campbell: Rocket this, Rocket that. Any one else sick of Raghib Ismail? Let's hear it for Campbell, who set up two touchdowns on Saturday against Nebraska with punt returns of 47 and 55 yards.

3. Higher Academics: CU starts two players (Hagen and fullback George Hemingway) who had such suspect high school grades that not even Oklahoma, which holds the unofficial season record for most Proposition 48 players (11, 1986), would touch them. Gotta love a school that's willing to take students with academic problems.

4. Who Else Is There? Notre Dame? Everyone loves them. Subway alumni galore. Dirtiest team I've seen this year. Can't wait 'til someone pays back Chris Zorich for all his cheap shots this season. (Am I the only one who saw Z-Man kick USC's John Jackson in the head a few weeks ago?)

Michigan? They blew their chance against the Irish. Need to learn how to cover kicks.

Florida State? Classic underachievers. Have started a trend of dropping out early in the campaign then coming on like a bat out of hell once it's too late. Also, let's admit it - they're no fun to watch since Prime Time graduated, ah, I mean used up his eligibility.

Alabama? No good. Must go and play Auburn and Reggie Slack. End of undefeated season.

5. The Buffalo. Who can forget the sight of the real life, mega-load Colorado Buffalo stampeding out of the tunnel in front of the team? I'd like to see the Fighting Irish try and brawl in the tunnel with Colorado while the Buffalo was around.

6. Next Year. It will look great next year when the Sooners travel to Boulder and tee off on CU. OU knocks off defending champs. Has a nice ring to it huh?

7. The Sal Factor. Before dying of cancer incumbent quarterback Sal Aunese told his teammates to make it to the Orange Bowl. What better or more heart warming story could there be for '89?

8. If They Lose Over the past three seasons 24 CU players have been arrested. Stud (6-5, 240) linebacker Kanavis McGhee spent three days in jail for assaulting a person in a bar. I-bone back J.J. Flannigan threatened someone with a gun. If the Buffs lose, best lock up the women and children.

9. The I-Bone. None of this traditional pro set, one back attack or run-n-shoot junk. CU has got the I-bone, which combines the I-formation and the wishbone. Totally bizzare.

10. Connections. I have a friend who used to go to the University of Colorado. If they make it to the Orange Bowl there's a shot I'll be there with my buddy.

Water polo gets Easterns invitation

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts water polo coach Russ Yarworth got the phone call Monday around 5 p.m. regarding his team's status in the upcoming Easterns. The news was good.

Well, kind of good. Good in the fact that the Minutemen were invited to participate in the eight-team championship meet. Not so good in that UMass is the eighth and final seeded team which means they draw Arkansas-Little Rock, the top seeded team.

"This is where we wanted to be," said Yarworth. "I think we can still reach our goal of the top five, but now we'll have to do it the hard way."

The teams joining UMass next weekend at the Naval Academy are (ranked in order of seed): Arkansas-Little Rock, Navy, Brown, Iona, Harvard, Washington and Lee, and Slippery Rock.

The Minutemen have already faced Little Rock once this season, way back when on Sept. 24. The results were less than favorable as UMass took it on the chin, 15-5. However, UMass was playing under less than ideal circumstances as Yarworth was forced to miss the game because of to family reasons.

"This time around we hope things we'll be different," said Yarworth. "They put their suits on the same way we do."

Fall Intramural champions crowned

The University of Massachusetts intramural office would like to congratulate the following individuals and teams who were crowned as champions for the fall intramural season.

In football, the Gamblers won a thrilling match-up in the co-rec division with the Screaming Yellow Monkies, 17-14, getting a 48-yard field goal with six seconds to play to provide the margin of victory.

On the men's side, it was Lambda Chi, rallying from behind with 15 points in the final quarter to take the title with a 32-28 win over Public Enemy.

In tennis, individual champions were Burak Pekcan in men's singles, and Cynthia McGill for the women.

The men's soccer championship was taken by the Top Gunns, while Pita was crowned the winner for the women. Doug's Beast took the softball title with an 8-5 win over Confusion.

John Triana and Marianne Hess were the co-rec foul shooting championships, hitting 40 out of 50 shots. Hess also took the individual women's free throw title, with Bob Guidice winning for the men. Ted Sider was crowned the individual badminton winner.

In track and field, it was a double victory for Martha Eddy, who captured both the high jump (5-feet-2) and low hurdles. The Butterfields came away victorious in ultimate frisbee.

In swimming, it was the Submarines who took the team title, with Greg Well winning the diving. In cross country, Christopher Albus outran the pack on the men's side, finishing in a time of 16:15, while Gail Gianoulis won the women's race in 20:46.

Students call for campuswide strike

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

"Strike! Strike! Strike!" chanted a crowd of about 600 students at a rally yesterday on the steps of the Student Union Building as a member of the so-called Union of Undergraduate Students told them state legislators are ignoring their concerns.

"We have the power to shut down the University," protester Binky Feldman told the crowd at a rally to protest state budget cuts.

"Because of anti-education and anti-student actions by the Legislature, we are being locked out of our own University and it's going to get worse," she said. "The only action that will have an affect on their [legislators'] deaf ears is to strike."

Holding placards and urging other students to join their efforts to protest state budget cuts, the students rallied for more than two hours and marched across campus to Haigus Mall and back to the Student Union.

The Union of Undergraduates, an organization formed recently to respond to budget cuts, is calling for students to walk out of classes at noon on Friday and meet at a campus location to be determined tonight. The strike is

Feldman said the Union will not change its position until it is proven that tuition and fees will not increase, there will be no faculty or staff layoffs, and state social services are not cut.

Organizers said they collected about 4,000 undergraduate signatures on a petition to support the strike.

Feldman, who is also a Commuter Area senator, urged members of the University community to act before the Legislature approves additional budget reductions.

"After fees and out-of-state tuition is increased, no one will be left to fight the cuts," she said.

Marc Kenen, a graduate student and chair of the the Leadership Coalition, said students, faculty and staff must make a determined effort to contact their state representatives daily.

"People have got to write postcards and make telephone calls," he said. "The only way we can have influence is by collective action."

The Leadership Coalition set up a table at the rally to collect written messages from students to their representatives.

Tracy Davis, president of the Student Government Association, said about 2,000 students wrote messages prior to the rally and about 2,000 more were collected yesterday. The postcards will be dropped off at the representatives' Statehouse offices today. Kenen said the proposed $500 student fee increase is nothing more than a $500 tax, which he said "should be distributed across the state and not put on our shoulders.

He said before students decide to strike they should do everything in their power to convince legislators to vote against cuts to higher education.

"Any person who is thinking about striking better damn well write a postcard and make a phone call first," he said. "Then we can say we tried to go through the process and have no alternative but to shut down the University."

Susan Parker, a contract administrator in the Computer and Information Science department, said some legislators will not vote for new taxes because they fear they won't be reelected.

"But we'll make sure they don't get reelected if they continue to cut the education budget," she said.

Davis said students must protest budget cuts every day, not only at organized rallies.

"We can't stop for a week, then start for a rally. We can't stop for finals or when we go home," she said. "Boston is not getting the message, we have to let them know that we take our education seriously."

Lennox says faculty will support strike

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Sara Lennox, the faculty coordinator of the Leadership Coalition, said yesterday the faculty will support an "organized" student strike and projected that the action may effectively block the repercussions of state budget cuts.

Lennox said the faculty is waiting for students to ask them to participate before they will plan to join the protest.

"This strike is a student/undergraduate action initiated due to frustration," she said. "At this point, the faculty hasn't been asked to act."

Lennox compared the prospective student strike to the student protests which occurred last spring at the city and state universities in New York, which were experiencing similar budget problems.

Thousands of protesters, facing tuition increases and faculty layoffs as state legislators attempted to balance the fiscal budget, staged building takeovers, sit-ins, and boycotts of classes for two weeks.

Because of the pressure of these student protests, Gov. Cuomo vetoed a bill which would have increased state tuition for public higher education.

If University of Massachusetts students are successful in sparking similar protests statewide, Lennox said the same results can be achieved.

"It is going to take a lot of coordination, but if the strike is planned and executed in an organized way," Lennox said. "We can show the legislators and the people of the state that we are concerned with the quality of and access to education."

Chancellor Joseph Duffey did not endorse the strike, but said it is justifiable due to the slew of budget cuts and the additional threat of a $500 fee increase per semester for in-state students and a $3,000 annual increase for out-of-state students.

Mrs. Dukakis recovering after swallowing rubbing alcohol

The Associated Press

Kitty Dukakis was hospitalized because she drank a small amount of rubbing alcohol and experienced a "severe reaction," her doctor disclosed yesterday.

Dr. Gerald Plotkin said in a prepared statement the wife of Gov. Michael Dukakis said she swallowed the liquid "in a state of exhaustion, with flu symptoms and depression." He said she was out of danger and the family and Mrs. Dukakis were deciding what steps to take next.

Plotkin said Mrs. Dukakis had been taking anti-depressants prescribed by her psychiatrist, but that tests indicated no other drugs or alcoholic beverages were involved in her current illness.

He did not comment on whether she knowingly tried to hurt herself or was seeking the effects of alcohol.

Susan Kaplan, a spokeswoman for the governor, said "All I can tell you is that you can read the statement." She also would not say how much of the rubbing alcohol Mrs. Dukakis had ingested.

"Kitty has suffered from a chemical dependency and struggled with depression for many years. These two problems often are related. Autumn has been a particularly bad season for her," said Plotkin.

Rubbing alcohol is most commonly sold as isopropyl alcohol, according to a spokesman for the Massachusetts Poison Center at Children's Hospital in Boston. It is more toxic than ethanol alcohol, which is in liquor, and is irritating to the stomach. But it causes the same effects as regular alcohol, and could be deadly only in very large amounts.

A woman who answered the phone at the Alcohol Abuse 24-hour Hotline said it was not uncommon for people with drinking problems to drink rubbing alcohol if nothing else was available.

Senate votes to approve student strike

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted overwhelmingly last night to support the student strike planned for Monday to voice demands addressing the future of public higher education.

The 66 to 11 vote, with nine abstentions, will support the concerns of the so-called Union of Undergraduates, a group of students who called for the strike.

"This is the most significant decision the SGA has ever made," said Sen. Lisa Nelson (Commuters), chair of the Public Policy Committee. "We are completely unstoppable and this will reach all of the other campuses and we will see reversal."

Members of the union, who led a rally across campus yesterday, said because the University has suffered $25 million in cuts

UM hoop signs Meyer, Johnson

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team continued to build for the future, signing Jeff Meyer, a 7-foot-2 center from Wausau, WI, and Jerome Johnson, a 6-foot-4 guard/ forward from Bridgeport, CT, to letters of intent to attend the University next September. The announcement was made yesterday by second-year head coach John Calipari.

Meyer averaged 10 points, eight rebounds and four blocks per game for East High School, which advanced into the state sectional semifinals.

Johnson was a teammate of UM freshman Harper Williams and was Co-Mr. Basketball in the state of Connecticut with Williams last year. Johnson averaged 22 points and 10 rebounds for Bassick High's 26-0 championship team, and is currently prepping at Maine Central Institute.

Correction

In a story in yesterday's Collegian, it was unclear whether the proposed $3,000 tuition increase for out-of state students covered the whole year or only a semester. The proposal is for out-of-state tuition to increase by about $3,000 per year, not per semester.

Vigil protests bombings in El Salvador

By DAVID FORRESTER
Collegian Correspondent

A group of University of Massachusetts students and local political activists held a candlelight vigil yesterday to protest the recent bombings of a labor union and the headquarters of a mothers' group in El Salvador.

The protesters, who gathered in front of the Amherst Post Office, held banners which read "U.S. Out" and "Stop U.S. Aid to El Salvador," while passers-by questioned them about their actions.

> "We are here to let people know that their tax dollars are going to fund the murder of Salvadoran people."
> – Linda Mannheim, CASA member.

Several onlookers joined the group after reading the group's literature.

Linda Mannheim, a member of the Central American Solidarity Assocation (CASA) said they scheduled the vigil for election day to attract the attention of elected officials.

"We are here to let people know that their tax dollars are going to fund the murder of Salvadoran people," she said.

Shirley Hill, a UMass Auxiliary Services employee and Amherst resident, said she agreed with Mannheim that the United States should not financially support El Salvador.

"The U.S. government simply shouldn't be spending money on rapes, bombings and murders," Hill said.

Hill, like Mannheim, said she questioned U.S. Sen. John Kerry's stance on aid to El Salvador. Mannheim said Sen. Kerry has made a turnaround from his usual progressive record by backing military aid to the Salvadoran government.

Hill said she was less shocked by Sen. Kerry's stand. She said she never regarded him as "progressive" because he hasn't done anything to stop the violence.

"The Congress has always looked at it as either send them guns or don't send them guns," she said. "They never addressed whether or not they should be interfering in another country's business."

Several of the protesters said they support aid to the people of El Salvador, but through civilian sources.

"Humanitarian aid from the U.S. Government would probably end up in the hands of the ARENA party government," Mannheim said.

She claimed government figures show that the United States gives $1.5 million a day to the ARENA party government, which took office in June in El Salvador after disputed elections.

Mannheim alleged that the money is used to arm the death squads, which is "just the overt funding."

Berer: Abortions are not safe around the world

By EMILY VASON
Collegian Correspondent

While debate continues in the United States over reproductive rights, Marge Berer of the Women's Global Network on Reproductive Rights in Amsterdam, said the need for safe and legal abortions around the globe is not being met.

Addressing a group of about 50 people at Hampshire College last week, Berer, a writer and organizer for the network, focused her lecture on the issue of maternal mortality and the need for safe medical procedures to prevent clandestine abortions.

Although the statistics on maternal mortality are incomplete, Berer said that about 25 percent of women's deaths in the Third World are caused by botched, "back alley" abortions.

Because many of these deaths are hidden by doctors and not recorded, Berer said the maternal death rates in those countries may be twice as high.

"It's not that women are having abortions, but rather the conditions in which they are having them," she said.

For example, abortion is legal in India, but because of its high expense, it is inaccessible to most women, Berer said.

Although many women attempt to get hospital treatment after botched abortions, some are refused medical attention and others risk death from incorrect treatments.

Berer claimed that these deaths are often hidden from the public by the doctor or the hospital to prevent legal repercussions.

In many Third World countries, abortion is used as a form of violence against women, Berer said. "Back alley" abortionists do not use sterilized instruments or anesthesia and usually conduct business in an area that is substandard of those where professional operations take place, she said.

She added that these types of abortions make women "feel like criminals." Consequently, she said, "abortion is seen as a criminal act."

However, Berer said that in Bangladesh and several African nations, some professional doctors may be performing abortions but reporting the process to officials or the government as something else.

She said when operations such as "menstrual regulation" and also various research projects are reported instead of abortion, it may actually mean women have secretly been able to obtain safe abortions.

"Abortion as a rights issue is everywhere, and as a health issue is everywhere," Berer said.

Berer said in many countries women need permission to obtain an abortion even though it is legal for them to undergo the process.

In Britain, women must obtain permission from at least two doctors to be able to have an abortion, Berer said.

However, even after a woman obtains permission, British law provides that the government may step in because "[the government] sees itself as having a stake in the future and therefore has a right to intervene," she said.

Berer concluded by describing the struggles that abortion rights activists will face in the future.

"Abortion is a battle that's seen its first round, not its last," she said.

Newsletter finds "neglected" issues

Five interns are STPEC's full-time writers

By STEPHEN PANGIONE
Collegian Staff

Ten people were discussing over breakfast in January issues they felt were inadequately covered by the general media.

The solution they came up with was to create their own newspaper in which they could expose these neglected issues and opinions. One week later, the first issue of The Weekly News rolled off the copy machine.

The paper, which is published through an internship program under the Social Thought and Political Economy department, has a circulation of about 2,500. It covers issues ranging from the depletion of the Amazon Rain Forest to corruption in governments worldwide.

David Caputo, founder and publisher of the paper, said the newspaper started because he and others felt the future of the world looked dim.

"We felt our survival was threatened," Caputo said. "This is our attempt to insure that our children and ourselves have a future ahead of us."

Caputo said the paper was modeled in the tradition of The Samizdat, an underground Russian newspaper in the pre-Glasnost era that was typed by hand and distributed to friends. The newspapers were then retyped and passed on.

With the invention of the facsimile and copy machines, distributing the newspaper is much easier, Caputo said. If a reader agrees to make two or more copies of The Weekly News, the paper will waive its subscription fee, he said.

State: crackdown on fake IDs to boost safety

By DAN BERTHIAUME
Collegian Staff

Gov. Dukakis recently announced that anyone caught using false identification to procure alchohol in Massachusetts will have their driver's license suspended for six months to a year.

Barbara Kopans of the Department of Public Safety said the state hopes to reduce the cases of drinking and driving in Massachusetts with this new law.

"We are trying to prevent highway deaths," she said. "The underage drinking age group is involved in a disproportionate number of highway deaths. We are trying to keep the Commonwealth roads safe."

If caught using fake IDs, out-of-state residents will suffer the same penalties as in-state residents, Kopans said. If an out-of-state student is penalized, their home state's registry will be notified of their action and will be able to add its own punishment, she said.

Kopans said undercover police will be stationed in package stores and restaurants statewide with orders to

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Strike now or pay later

The Collegian unconditionally supports any University of Massachusetts students who choose to go on strike in protest of the Statehouse's continued budget cuts to our University.

To coin a phrase — we've tried everything.

For two years, we've phoned, written and lobbied state legislators, asking them not to slash our budget. For what? More cuts. Our pleas fell on deaf ears. At the massive rally at the Statehouse on Oct. 18, which was reportedly the largest rally since the anti-Vietnam War rallies, legislators shut their doors on us and went home.

We're willing to take our fair share of cuts to state programs, but this is ridiculous. With the impending cuts, UMass' operating budget will have been slashed by 10 percent this semester alone. Public higher education, which took 38 percent of these latest cuts, comprises six percent of the state's budget.

Can you, an in-state student, afford a $525 fee increase? Can, you, an out-of-state student, afford a $3,000 tuition increase? Even if you can afford the increases, how many students will have to drop out of school because of the increases? How many people who deserve a university education, and are entitled to one, will be denied the right?

Out of the 2,000 graduate teaching assistants at the University last semester, 600 have been fired. 140 more are in danger of losing their jobs if the Statehouse's "savings package" goes into effect.

When we enrolled at UMass, we entered into an agreement with the University and the Commonwealth to provide us with an education. By paying our bills every semester, we've lived up to our end of the bargain, but they've failed theirs.

Last year in New York, when the state's legislature tried to balance their budget on students' backs, angry students responded by taking over administration buildings and going on strike from their universities. After the strike spread upstate, Governor Cuomo vetoed the legislation that would raise students' fees and tuition.

4,000 students have already signed petitions calling for a strike on the University. We need 20,000 more students — the figure should be 21,000, but the first-year class was reduced by 900 students this semester — to make this strike work.

Attend a meeting tonight at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom to find out more about the STRIKE ON UMASS.

Problems must first be solved

An article in yesterday's Collegian, ("Bill may hike fees by $500," Nov. 8) mentioned a potential $3,000 tuition increase for out-of-state students. If this will be the case, hundreds of out-of-state students may not have the resources to return to UMass next semester. Because it is more competitive for out-of-state students to gain entrance into UMass, the overall academic quality of these students is typically of high quality.

There would also be a severe loss of diverse attitudes and experiences from out-of-state students that would enrich the University as a whole. UMass athletic coaches would not be able to influence out-of-state student/athletes. It is well known that quality athletics create financial gain for a university.

The problems imposed by a potential out-of-state tuition increase of this magnitude are far too great for the short relief it will create in the spring semester.

Hey, those new glasses look great on you!

I saw a movie on cable a few weeks ago, John Carpenter's They Live. Not only was it an excellent film, but it affected me so much that I haven't stopped thinking about it.

Briefly: the story is about a drifter (Rowdy Roddy Piper, from Piper's Pit, WWF, the whole deal), who comes across these glasses that allow you to see aliens who are disguised as humans, and the subliminal messages they have put into all forms of media all over the world in their attempt to "colonize" the earth.

The main signal comes from the roof of a cable TV station, and Rowdy Roddy and his sidekick spend a good portion of the movie trying to get there so they can destroy it.

The thing that really got me was these glasses. When you put them on, you can see who's human and who isn't, because the aliens have these ugly, skeleton faces. To top it all, every magazine, newspaper, book and billboard has messages which are normally only visible to the unconscious mind. They say things like: "marry and reproduce," "don't question authority," "stay asleep," and other stuff designed to repress earthly society into zombie-like, ignorant pumpkin heads.

If you do see the movie, you'll notice that it's very Marxist in principle (wonder if B. Trembly and the gang over at OMS have seen it?) The whole concept of being able to see "who's cool and who isn't" is fascinating. Imagine having a pair of glasses that let you see what people were honest, what people were dishonest, who was a crook, who was a fascist, a socialist, a nazi, a communist, a democrat, a republican, who liked you, who hated you. who was Italian, Irish, Jewish, Polish, who was gay, who was straight, who was bisexual, who was on your side, who was your enemy. You could point out anybody you wanted. You could see people for what they really are. You could reinforce whatever stereotypes you wanted. You could oppress, repress and depress anybody, and the most amazing thing is that they would have no idea why . . .

Cosmo Macero Jr.

I'm glad it was only a movie.

- I never thought I'd be part of a student's union, because when it comes to academics, I don't think I qualify as "skilled labor." However, come Monday, I'll be ready to strike . . . how about you?
- I bartend at Barsie's every Tuesday afternoon from 12 to 6 p.m. Feel free to stop by, chit-chat, watch a little CNN and have some cocktails. I'd just love some company.
- If those glasses really did exist, I think Mike Dukakis would look the ugliest of anybody.
- I've lost $40 betting on football games the last two weeks. Fifteen of it makes up the actual bets I made, the other 25 I spent on 1-900 Las Vegas line numbers. "The Doctor," a PhD. in statistics who now devotes his time to handicapping college and pro games, guarantees 3 out of 4 winners every week. Guess I picked the one loser . . . twice in a row. Thanks Doc.

Why stop FBI recruiting here and now?

Gotta love the fact that the FBI is being allowed to recruit on campus.

Gotta be amazed that, despite all of the hub-bub created when the CIA tried the same thing in 1986, nobody bothered to do anything to disrupt the informational meeting Tuesday in the Career Center, or yesterday's recruitment processes.

Jim Clark

It makes me wonder, though. Are people finally coming to their senses? Has light finally dawned on marble brains that, yes, freedom of speech is a two-way street? That no matter what your opinion, people have the right to be heard, and conversely, people have the right to make their own decisions?

Ah, differing opinions. Everybody has them, and the uproar over what people felt the CIA was involved in, right or wrong, is what this was all about. That was the main reason the administration, in the wake of the '86 turmoil, banned the CIA from ever setting foot on UMass concrete again. And was presumed to be the reason why people were fearful of bringing the FBI here.

Here's one vote for the FBI, from someone who has every James Bond movie in his video library at home. From someone who has toured the FBI Building in Washington and come away amazed. From someone who took a criminology class last year and has seen the hard statistics. From someone who thinks the biggest and most important Top 10 list in the country hangs on the wall of every post office.

Detractors point fingers at the supposed "deaths" that are FBI-related. But what about the deaths that the organization prevents?

The drug problem, for example. People are dying for no reason on city streets across the country every day, victims of the crazy drug war. Wouldn't want to crack down on those kingpins now, would we?

Or how would you like it if some neanderthal-looking character with a chainsaw and a hockey mask (where have I seen that before?) showed up at your front door one night and wanted to cut you to ribbons? Fun stuff.

OK, so you won't buy the gory, horror movie death bit. Nope. People like Mark Branch (the guy who terrorized Greenfield last year) just don't exist. Only in the movies.

Well, let's try this one. You have a four-year-old boy. One day you're in the house while your bundle of joy is presumably outside playing in the front yard. Suddenly, you call him for supper, and . . .

He's gone.

No FBI. No pictures on milk cartons. No pictures in the post office, or on video game screens. No more four-year-old, either.

What's this? Cries of J. Edgar Hoover? Anti-civil rights? All right. We can get into the instrumental role that the FBI plays in cracking down on such racist organizations as the Ku Klux Klan, or the Skinheads.

There are people who want to be involved in the FBI for these very reasons. All they want to do is stick a pipe in their mouth, throw on the Inspector Clouseau hat and go out and clean up this mess that we live in.

For those reasons alone, we should allow the FBI to recruit whoever the hell they want, whenever, wherever, however. Stopping them from doing so would be like protesting the police academy because of the death of Timothy Shepard (who died last year in Agawam after collapsing from dehydration during training). True, their training tactics are highly questionable, but the fact remains that life would be nil without them.

Call me a hypocrite if you will. Call me naive. But don't call me if you get caught in the middle of a drug shootout, or if Freddy sticks his fingernails in your back and then kidnaps your wife. Call the FBI. That's what they're here for.

In our society...enough is enough

It pulls like a magnet, with all the force and strength of gravity itself. It chokes like a prisoner's shackles, with all the suffocation and severity of bondage. It deviates like a powerful undertow, straying us far away from the shore of our true, human identity. The culprit is society. Its weapon is the mass media and mortal weakness. Its crime is the stripping of our human potential through societal pressure.

Josh Galitsky

We are all products of a society that tries its damnedest to tear our humanity from limb to limb and replace our real selves with an anxiety-ridden, materialistic clone. It begins early when we are children, glowing and curious to the world around us. We are peeled away from the skin of our natural emotions and are taught behavior that denies our real feelings:

Bite the bullet. Stop crying. How can you laugh right now? Shut up! Don't touch that. Kiss Granny. Follow the rules.

After we are raped of our emotions, we are isolated and shoved into stereotypical, sexual roles and labeled, like butterflies in a jar:

Boys are strong. Boys don't hug. Boys don't get scared. Girls are pretty. Girls are passive. Girls are pink. Act like a man. Be a good girl.

We have all been robbed of our true identities and we spend the greater part of our lives searching for what was rightfully ours to begin with. We struggle against the haunting voices that shout, "you are not good enough, smart enough, worthy enough." When we are young, these beliefs define us, deflecting us further from our true person inside. As we grow older, these teachings often make bitter and lonely, our life's journey.

High school, for many, was the culmination of our struggle against society's rigidity and conformity. Some fit in, some didn't, and some were caught in the middle. Regardless of our position, there was always that giant monster at the door, ready to attack us when our self-esteem was reeling. It was always under our bed gurgling, whispering our shortcomings in the darkness of the night. Many of us grew up hating ourselves even in the light of our wonderous accomplishments and praise from our loving friends.

College, for some, is the first breath of discovering who we really are. We see that the great hands that once choked us and smacked our defiance now applaud our sense of exploration and freedom. Some women choose not to shave their legs or wear makeup. Some men choose not to drink heavily to impress others. Some people decide they are sick and tired of denying their sexuality and accept themselves as being gay.

There is no easy solution that can liberate us from our past. There is no magical diet or potion that can put to rest, the horror show that we have been through. A few of us were given the most special gift possible from our childhood, the knowledge that we are worthy of happiness. Others need to listen to our friends who witness a beauty in us that we can't always see. We all need to ignore those awful voices that say that we are not, "slim enough, gorgeous enough, and acceptable enough." We need to shout back, "Enough is enough and by God. . . we are enough.

Students are here to learn

While in anxious anticipation of exams, most students go to class expecting and hoping to get some reassurance and encouragement. Most students expect to hear that the exam will be fair and that those who truly put an effort into the class should be able to do well.

I went to one of my classes this week with these notions in mind. We began class by discussing the exam, and conversation between the professor and various students ensued. Some students asked about the level of difficulty of the exam. This is a tricky question.

Minu Sebastian

Professors are faced with the task of creating a "fair" but "challenging" exam. But how do you determine what that level of challenge should be?

My professsor seemed to answer this question with the following statement: "I generate a 30 percent wrong answer rate." Hearing those words immediately left this stressed and frustrated feeling in the pit of my stomach. Not only was I feeling more tense about taking the exam, but I also felt infuriated by such a remark.

There seems to be a dual message being sent to us. Study hard and understand the material, but be prepared to be tricked into choosing the wrong answer. Sounds somewhat hypocritical to me.

What is the point of an exam anyway? I always thought it was to genuinely test your knowledge of the material. Of course you would be expected to face some challenging questions, but an in-depth knowledge of the material should be all you need to face the challenge.

Hearing my professor implying that he actively tries to manipulate 30 percent of his students into choosing the wrong answer raises some questions in my mind. How does he go about making up such questions? In what way does he try to distort the information so that we will not understand? Does he manipulate words or does he put in questions that only "certain" students will understand? And which students are the ones who are the victims of such methods?

My final question: How can we, as students, be assured of having a fair opportunity to do well in a class?

Many students genuinely desire to do learn something. But how many of us are discouraged and feel inadequate by exam scores? A low exam score does not mean that you did not know or are not capable of understanding the material. It could mean that the type of questions you are facing are vague or overly technical that many people would not grasp.

How much of a say can students have in the type of exam they face? Since we are the ones who must take the exam and since we are the ones who are here for a decent education, it seems as though we have a right to have some input on the type of questions we face.

We are in college to learn, to become better, more knowledgeable and open-minded people.

We are not here to take manipulative and misleading exams.

Letters to the Editor

Minorities are ignored in the press

In response to Erin Martin's article ("Be conscious of violence," Nov. 3.), does Martin think that the fact the Stuart family was White had nothing to do with the coverage it was given?

Race and violence go hand-in-hand. The fact that this family was White had a lot to do with the attention it received.

Do not misunderstand me, this incident was newsworthy, as worthy as a Black child shot down in a drug war, numbers of homeless people dying over a cold night, police brutality of Black and minority youth, and so on.

The NAACP said that the Stuart shooting got the coverage it did because they were White, this is, for the most part, true. It seems to me, violence against Blacks and minorities has become so common, that it no longer sells. Yes, the shooting was news, I do not argue that fact, but the NAACP also has a point.

Have we gotten, or are we regressing back to a period of history where the value of your life depends on the color of your skin? Are we at a point where violence against Blacks and minorities can be ignored simply because it happens so often?

We tend to notice violence when it hits closest to us. You might feel closer to the Stuart family's background, making the shooting more real to you. Different people relate to different things depending on how, where, and when they were brought up.

Unfortunately, I see the race of the victim playing a large role in what is printed in our newspapers today. Concerning the Stuart shooting, I see it with a broader scope. It is another tragic occurrence, for which we all should grieve.

As for the rest of Martin's article, I say, be more realistic. We, at this university, do not come from small towns where you can leave your door open and not have problems. We come from different cultures, places, upbringings — there are bound to be conflicts.

In concluding, and as not to leave on a sour note, I'll say that there is always hope. It is when or if we take the initiative, that will decide whether together we die, or together we live.

Why not invite the Duke to babysit?

With the Governor and the legislature so determined to turn this University into a third rate institution, it is heartening to see that the Collegian and the Distinguished Visitors program are supporting them in their efforts. In addition to running a daily horoscope, the Collegian is running a review of soap operas. Good job! Don't stop there, Collegian.

Give us a review of professional wrestling, an Occult Affairs Page, a staff psychic. Review slasher films. Meanwhile, the Distinguished Visitors Program is sponsoring a talk on UFOs. Couldn't you get Elvis or Bigfoot instead?

It is encouraging to know that nothing is going to happen to shake Mike Dukakis out of his belief that the University of Massachusetts is a babysitting service for rowdy cretins who couldn't get into Harvard or MIT.

Look at the big TEAM picture

Al Arpad's column ("See beyond Team proposal," Nov. 8) has several inaccurate claims. How could an 'astute observer" write, "given the past priorities of the Legislature, that public higher education will receive any significant share of whatever new money there is." An astute observer would have known that if the TEAM petition becomes law, the Legislature does not have control over the appropriation of the generated $300-400 million, since it will already be earmarked by the law. Arpad asserts that the TEAM proposal will not stop the budget cuts. He fails to see the broad picture. If the TEAM proposal passes in 1990, UMass should see between $15-25 million as soon as FY 1991.

When you sign a petition initiative, you are not advocating its, position but demonstrating a belief in the democratic process. Only registered voting could legitimize the TEAM ideals.

Arpad's attack may cause division between Collins and TEAM supporters. With less than 10 days to go, put aside the differences in the two proposals and sign them both. You'll assure that debate is continued and public higher education is not cut short.

FBI recruitment info session in Orchard Hill met by few protestors

Low attendance due to planning conflicts

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

About 100 students from the University of Massachusetts crowded into the University Career Building in Orchard Hill Tuesday night for an hour long FBI recruitment seminar led by special agent Bob Gardener.

"I'm here to debunk the myths," Gardener said, before explaining the FBI's extensive hiring process to the students, more than half of whom were seniors.

Five student demonstrators sat quietly outside the building during the entire seminar to protest the recruitment and the FBI's "covert" actions across the country.

The demonstrators lit about 20 white candles and placed them near the building's entrance in memory of the El Salvadorans they said have "disappeared" because the FBI allegedly listed them among those who had attempted to flee their homeland for the United States in 1988.

Protester Leonard Peltier said the low attendance at the protest was a result of conflicts with planning for other rallies, such as protests against state budget cutbacks.

"Our point is to show that FBI recruiting is not undisputed," Peltier said. "It's a strange coincidence that this [seminar] is being held at such an obscure location and the day before the [budget cut] rally."

The small and peaceful protest was in sharp contrast to demonstrations which occurred on campus in November of 1986 when more than 100 protesters held several rallies to protest CIA recruitment then ongoing at the same building.

About 60 people were arrested during the demonstrations, including the late flamboyamnt activist Abbie Hoffman and Amy Carter, daughter of former President Carter. The demonstrators were later acquitted of the all charges made.

During the seminar, as Gardener explained the history of the bureau, a protester entered room and quietly distributed flyers listing allegedly "covert" operations of the FBI.

Immediately after this demonstration, a UMass police officer entered the room and remained until the end of the seminar.

At the end of his speech, Gardener said, "You get the feeling that you're doing something important, that there's a respect and appreciation for what you stand for and for what you do."

He added that the people he's worked with in the FBI have been "the finest people I have ever met in my life. We're talking about special men and women, people who've been able to just say no to drugs all their life and who have college degrees."

since the curtailments began three years ago, it is unable to serve its academic mission.

A press release submitted by strike organizers calls for a "walkout" from classes Friday at noon. The organizers also are urging students to launch a campuswide strike on Monday.

Jonathan Leavitt, a strike organizer, said about 4,000 students have signed a statement saying that they will participate in the strike.

Leavitt said the strike is an effort to block additional fee or tuition increases and faculty and staff layoffs. The group's ultimate goal is to install "progressive tax reform legislation" to stabilize funding to higher education.

Nelson said that by endorsing the strike, the Senate will have a role in determining how the strike takes shape. "It is rushed, but we have to act immediately," she said.

Sen. Jason Anthony (Field/Grayson), who voted in favor of supporting the strike, addressed several concerns before the vote. He said that yesterday's rally had been planned for two weeks and only drew 250 students.

"It is important to present ourselves as academically responsible," Anthony said."If the media picks up that students are only willing to protest when it involves not attending classes, it could be very detrimental to the cause as a whole."

Student Attorney General Robert Fadel suggested the SGA aid the union by offering office space and/or Student Activities Trust Fund monies in support of the strike.

Nelson said a coordinating committee will hold a planning meeting tonight to discuss their course of action. There will be a teach-in during the strike "to show the public that we don't need the University to get an education," she said.

LSC wants the right to fight for students

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Legal Services Center, which was banned three years ago from representing students in litigation, is petitioning the administration to return this service.

Charles J. DiMare, directing attorney at Legal Services, located in Campus Center room 922, said he will deliver the petition to Dennis L. Madson, vice chancellor for Student Affairs.

The center offers free advice to as many as 2,000 fee-paying students each year.

"Right now, we are prohibited from representing students unless the case was filed before on or before August 1987," said DiMare. "After [August, 1987], we are no longer able to represent students but we believe [this power] will be restored."

The former Legal Services Office, established in the 1970s, was able to fully represent students in litigation, even against the University, by the Board of Trustees in 1975.

LSO held this power until August 1986 when the Board of Trustees revoked the office's power to represent students against the University.

"We sued the University about twelve times," DiMare said. "Some of the University administrators we sued felt the law suits against the University were inappropriate. They [the suits] interfered with the smooth operation of the University because of the fear of being sued."

In the wake of the revocation, several students filed suit in an effort to overturn the Trustees' decision. The U.S. District Court ruled in favor of the Trustees.

The Trustees established the Legal Services Center in August, 1987, and it has operated in place of the Legal Services Office since.

Legal Services is financed by the student activities fee and the graduate student tax, which appears on each semester's bill.

The LSC staff is comprised of four attorneys, two administrative and secretarial support staff, law students, and several undergraduate legal assistants. The staff is able to provide aid in areas such as consumer rights, housing discrimination, civil rights, and labor problems.

The Center publishes a bi-semester newsletter titled: "Student Rights Advocate," and a variety of pamphlets to educate students about legal actions.

LSC also holds workshops and offers an internship program for undergraduate students.

Crossing the line between ignorance and understanding

By JENNIFER FINOCCHIO

A Dry White Season
Amherst Cinema

FILM REVIEW

In A Dry White Season, director Euzhan Palcy takes us on a journey through the South African terrain of real-life ideology and reality.

It is a powerful film for several reasons, the most important being that it does not allow us to subscribe to the common belief that apartheid is a cut-and-dry battle, which unconditionally pits Blacks against Whites. It is a film which illustrates the tragedy of an entire people chained to a crude system of political oppression.

Donald Sutherland plays Ben, a member of the White, affluent middle-class whose life is turned upside down when he becomes involved in a black family's investigation of the alleged "suicide" of his gardener (Winston Ntshona).

His character is distinctive, because it is not the typical portrayal of an evil, Black-hating monster, or devoted White hero dedicated only to the Black South African cause. Rather, he is a family man, comfortably indifferent to the solid line between Blacks and Whites, because he has never known anything else. In effect, he is chained to his society by his ideological view of it.

Ben's initiation to the other side of the racial fence effectively displays his rude awakening to reality. Not only is he finally exposed to the tortures inflicted on the Black population by "respectable" government officials, he gradually becomes aware of the fear tactics used by the government to manipulate White non-conformists.

He learns first hand that human justice is not on the political agenda in South Africa.

Ben's initial ignorance to the vile injustices endured by South African Blacks in effect mirrors the crux of a complex example of political suppression, in which outright brutality is carefully hidden behind a veil of ideology.

Palcy unabashedly unveils these all too familiar falsehoods — that Blacks are savage brutes incapable of governing themselves and that the South African government is acting to save them from themselves — by intercutting scenes which display the opposite.

One scene in which a colonel confidently extols the merits of apartheid and its benefits to both Blacks and Whites is brashly juxtaposed with a scene of a Black man being physically tortured by an equally "sympathetic" government official.

The success of Palcy's film is due primarily to her candid examination of apartheid, exposing it as political oppression which confines both Blacks and whites to its policies. While the graphic depiction of violence against Blacks is indispensible in this film, the message transgresses far beyond immediate violence. Rather, it goes on to illustrate that in South Africa, ignorance is bliss and to cross the line between ignorance and understanding — between Black and White — is to enter a world where "life can never be the same again."

Watching the peoples go round and round

By KIM BRATER
Collegian Correspondent

People-watching is a social art in our society. It is socially accepted, though some may not like to admit it.

ABOUT TOWN

A good place to people watch is where there are a lot of things happening at the same time. Also, a place where one can be discrete is another important quality.

Bonducci's Cafe in Amherst, has some 350 customers per day. Their busiest times are before work, the 8 a.m.-9 a.m. rush, the late-risers from 10 a.m.-10:30 a.m., the lunchtime crowd, and the evening group between 5 p.m.-7.pm. On a nice day, you can hang-out at one of the tables on the sidewalk and view the passers-by.

"Regulars come in every day and stay three to four hours at a time," said Bonducci's employee Hank Alexandre. "It's a relaxed atmosphere, except the rushes. There's a mix of people who just want to hang. And you don't have to wear black to come in here."

Another place to sit if you're in the mood to observe others, is a window table at the Classe Cafe on 168 North Pleasant St. in Amherst. Their busiest times are Saturday from 9 a.m. until 3 p.m. for the brunch customers, and from 7 a.m.-9 a.m., 12 p.m.- 2 p.m., and 5 p.m.-7 p.m. Monday through Friday.

"You can't use just one word to describe the atmosphere at Classe," said manager Gretchen Schott. "Home-style and comfortable come to mind." The typical regular at Classe Cafe is a local, but there are a lot of students in and out at various times of the day. "We get the after-class crowd who come in for coffee and to hang-out with their friends," said Schott.

Other places where you won't seem too obvious if you want to watch people are Judie's and Delano's, both with tables next to large windows looking out onto the busy Amherst streets.

On campus are great places to observe, such as the Hatch, the Bluewall, and even the library. For expert watchers, try the PVTA buses; the morning and late evening passengers are the best.

In essence, you can practice this ancient art anywhere. These are but a few of the best places to perfect your people watching skills. So, here's looking at you.

“Our main goal is to get our opinions known to as many people as possible and together we might change something,” he said.

The Weekly News is distributed mainly in the Pioneer Valley area, but copies are sent as far away as Florida and California.

“Some people picked up a copy while attending a [Grateful Dead] show. They liked it and bought a subscription,” she said.

The Weekly News publishes many articles submitted by its readers, Caputo said. But most of the stories are written by the five student interns at STPEC who are the paper's full-time writers, he said.

Campus and local reaction to the paper has been widely favorable, Caputo said.

“After tabling on the Campus Center Concourse, a lot of positive response came in the form of letters and donations from groups such as MassPirg, the Animal Rights Coalition, and the Rainforest Action group,” he said.

Caputo writes a column that has appeared in most issues, entitled “Bushwacking.” Bushwacking is a reaction to the lax coverage of President Bush by the general media, he said.

Although some of the costs for the production of the newspaper are generated from advertising, much of the initial funding came from Caputo himself.

The Weekly News will be holding a fundraiser tonight at Katina's, beginning at 7:00 to try to raise more money for the paper. Two bands will be playing for them, Adverse Condition and Iron Elf. Both groups play original rock music. The Weekly News is asking for a $10 donation, but they will accept any amount people want to donate to keep the paper running.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Laziness could land you in trouble. Buckle down to work and give office gossips a wide berth. Your self-discipline will pay off in the near future. Higher-ups are contemplating changes in assignments.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You are able to communicate effectively now. Seize a unique opportunity at work. Certain sweeping changes will be approved. An unexpected schedule revision favors your interests.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Look for ways to increase your income and acquire needed items for your home. A casual flirtation could prove embarrassing at a later date. Be careful not to make promises you cannot keep.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be receptive to suggestions from more-experienced people. Social contacts could lead to meaningful new business associations. Follow your instincts in an affair of the heart. Protest your privacy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your expenses are apt to be higher now. Postpone costly outings and purchases and put more thought into work endeavors. Remember to let your associates take the initiative now and then.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Good financial news arrives from overseas. Sales opportunities develop closer to home, too. An old friend is willing to back a pet project. Physical fitness improves your brain power. Show more affection.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Stop leaping from project to project. An old idea may be revived to cut costs and boost profits. Try new methods. Be honest with your mate about your expectations.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Watch a tendency to get your signals crossed. Take accurate notes during business conferences. Relax at home this evening. Reading or watching television provides a delightful armchair journey.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Launch a campaign to reinforce your financial position. Your practice and diplomacy serve you well. Make firm plans for certain personal rewards. You deserve them! Romance could be deceptive.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be more self-reliant and you will save yourself disappointment. Romantic partner is the right person to consult about a career change. Stay put until something definite comes along.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Someone at work may try to palm off an unpleasant assignment. think fast or you may get stuck with it. Family squabbles cause tension. Do what you can to smooth ruffled feathers.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Go all-out to promote a public project or event. Real estate deals can be lucrative now. Keep a promise to a younger person. Refuse to argue with someone who never seems to learn.

confiscate false IDs and have students sign affadavits confirming the user's real identity. The affadavits will be sent to the Registry of Motor Vehicles, she said.

Dale Harris, a sophomore at the University of Massachusetts, said he does not think the new law will be effective in deterring students from using false IDs. "It's going a little overboard because people can just have someone of legal age buy for them," he said.

Kopans said a person who is dissatisfied with a registry-issued license suspension has the right to appeal it in court. The registry will usually give the minimum suspension, but she said the court may choose to extend the suspension if an appellant is found guilty.

However, UMass freshman Greg Karamanian said he thinks the new regulations are too strict. "I don't think the rule should be so harsh," he said.

One book with miles of truth and life

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

One of the most contentious topics in jazz today is the music of Miles Davis. Miles has spearheaded many of the most important developments in the music since the 1940s, styles that have come to be known as "hard bop," "cool," "modal" and "fusion." Jazz purists reject the pop-derived music he plays today, while others say it is still valid. The latter have come to be known as "Miles apologists." Now, we have a chance to hear from the ultimate Miles apologist: Miles himself. He has just published his autobiography, and it's a great book.

Valley Jazz

Biographies and autobiographies are the best books to read if you want to learn about jazz. It is impossible to separate the art from the artist in this form of music; therefore, the more you can learn about the artist, the better you will understand his or her music. Miles: The Autobiography is the most successful jazz autobiography to date, because it is direct and candid, and because it gives equal attention to the music as well as the musician.

The book is written in "vernacular," and it reads as if Miles is talking to you. This is great, but if you are offended by profane languages, you may find the constant stream of "MF" and "S" words off-putting. He tells fascinating stories about his friends and colleagues, including just about every major figure in jazz. His life is easily divided up into "episodes" based on the various bands he led and styles he pioneered; these episodes are represented by chapters in the book.

In detail, he recounts his childhood as the son of a Black dentist in the midwest; the glory days of bebop in 1940s New York with Dizzy, Bird, Max and Monk; the heady revolutionary spirit of the '60s and the death of Coltrane; the birth of fusion in the '60s and '70s; his five-year "retirement" in the late 70s, and so on. His candor and opinions are "juicy," to say the least.

For example, he makes Charlie Parker out to be a screwed-up, unreliable, self-abusive person whose status as the greatest alto saxophonist of all time went straight to his head. He portrays John Coltrane as a quiet, self-absorbed person who was totally into his music (as well as his heroin and booze). His portraits of other such as Monk, Dizzy Gillespie, Gil Evans and some of his band members are more flattering. He also expresses admiration for such pop stars as Jimi Hendrix, Carlos Santana, and James Brown.

He blames his well-known "feud" with Wynton Marsalis on the press and on CBS (both his and Wynton's record label at the time), saying that it was just their way of stirring up controversy for the sake of publicity, and that it is typical of the White racist "divide-and-conquer" approach that pits Blacks against each other in order to keep them down. He is quite outspoken against racism and about the problems of drugs — he himself had problems with heroin and cocaine, both of which he claims to have licked.

But the most interesting thing about the book is the portrait of Miles himself, especially since he has been such a reclusive figure. Instead of the flashy clothes, bad temper, taciturnity and general "mystique" of his public record, we get the real Miles, once and for all. In addition to being heavily opinionated, he comes across as impulsive, audacious, lusty, emotional and self-assured — in short, as quintessentially human and (like all great artists) very complex.

Miles: The Autobiography is a terrific book. It gives a birds-eye view (no pun intended) of developments in Black music from the 1940s to date, and gives new insights into many of its greatest practitioners. It also makes for entertaining reading. No matter what you think of Miles' current music, his book is a must.

A lesbian celebration

FLOWER, For Love of Women Economic Resources, is presenting a Coming Out Party on Nov. 11 at 7:30 at the Northampton Center for the Arts.

FLOWER was founded almost nine years ago to recycle some money to support lesbian culture. The group is now opening itself to the community and sponsoring this celebration.

In the past, FLOWER's funding has gone to women's organizations where lesbians are active, to support feminine ideas, art, and theater. They have sponsored a lesbian art show and monetarily support poor women. FLOWER has also sponsored a one woman theater that dealt with alcoholism.

FLOWER, along with being an organization for lesbians, is also committed to activities for the disabled and sponsoring diverse multi-cultural affairs.

Organized by BUDS, a sub-organization of FLOWER and the New Moon Production, the event is expected to showcase several qualitative and local types of entertainment.

The New Womyn's Chorus, a six-month-old ensemble of about 30 women will perform. Jyl Lyn Feldman, a UMass teacher and writer, will read from her collection of short stories entitled Hot Chicken Wings. The African percussion and dance group, Umoja Ensemble, will make its debut at the celebration. FLOWER member, Mary V., will DJ the dance following the event.

Sue Krause, FLOWER member and BUD member, specified that the event is for "lesbians and their allies."

Tickets are being sold on a sliding scale between $7 and $11. Proceeds will benefit the FLOWER organization. There will be an American Sign Language interpretation for those with the need.

Tickets are available at Lunaria in Northampton and Bridge Street Books in Shelburne Falls. They can also be acquired through mail by writing to P.O. Box 833, Northampton, MA 01061. — PAMELA PERRAULT

Hellmuth fits helmet of Conan-like defender

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Correspondent

Holly Hellmuth, or should I say Conan? Or is it Helmet?

"I've been called Conan a lot of times from the [East] regional team," Hellmuth said. "I think it is because I have blond hair. The reason I'm called Conan at UMass is because someone caught me trying to peel the letters off this tee-shirt that said Conan."

Conan might only be a nickname, but the imagery of someone strong, forceful and intense fits the description of Hellmuth's style of play on the field.

As for Helmet, "That came from the trainer [Steve Babcock], because he thought that my last name was Helmet, and then I scored my first goal on a header [against Cornell] and the name kind of stuck."

Freshman Holly Hellmuth is impressing the soccer world. "She is one of the top freshmen in the country," said UMass coach Jim Rudy.

Hellmuth hails from the northern Virginia area along with five other UMass players, including her roommate, Skye Eddy. She had quite a dilemma as to where she would attend college.

Rudy was one of the main reasons why Hellmuth came to UMass. "My final decision was between UMass and the University of Virginia, and I came to UMass because I liked the coach at UMass a lot better," said Hellmuth.

"I was having a really hard time making my decision [where to go to school]. I talked to a lot of people who knew the UVa coach [Laurie Gregg] and a lot of people who knew J.R. [Jim Rudy] and they basically said J.R. is a better coach.

'Basically I wanted to come here because I liked the soccer program. I talked to Skye and she said that she liked him too," said Hellmuth.

Incidentally, the Reds defeated the Cavaliers of Virginia in the first round of the NCAA tournament last Sunday in Virginia. For Hellmuth, the victory was, "Sweet revenge."

Hellmuth has been credited with being the most surprising player on the team this year. She attributes this compliment to the fact that she works hard. "There's a lot of pressure, a lot more pressure in a college game than there are in the normal high school game, and that helps," Hellmuth said.

Freshman defender Holly Hellmuth can do almost anything on the field, especially when she puts her head to it.

There are not a lot of freshman who like the pressure, but then again Holly Hellmuth is not your everyday frosh. "She's not like a normal freshman," said Rudy. "She's rugged and uncompromising on the field, but at the same time she is a skillful player. She reads the game exceptionally well for a freshman. Her timing of when to come

Rudy praised Hellmuth's defensive play, specifically, her ability to cover an opposing team's forward. "She's a tough and imposing player. She's marked her player well all year."

To say the least, Rudy has been pleased with Hellmuth and his only criticism is, "We can't seem to get her forward more than we would like.'

Hellmuth admits that she has not mastered when to go on the attack and when to stay back, but working with midfielder April Kater has helped speed up the learning process. "I want to learn how to come forward out of the back. I'm getting better at it because I'm playing with April [Kater]. And just knowing what she's going to do has helped me."

Hellmuth described her player-coach relationship with Rudy as that of a father figure. "J.R.'s office is always open," Hellmuth said. Rudy, however, played down the compliment from Hellmuth by saying, "I'm a much different father than she's ever had."

This weekend the team travels to Colorado for their NCAA quarterfinal round match with the No. 2 team in the nation, Colorado College (not to be confused with the University of Colorado, whose football team is ranked second in the nation).

Hellmuth knows that anything is possible, but she believes that realistically, "We have a good chance of winning, because we're a hard team, we work hard and we concentrate on defense. If we don't have as much talent as the other team, then we work harder than them and we get our results by pounding the ball down their throats, instead of trying to move the ball around."

If UMass comes home from Colorado with a victory they will be headed to the Final Four, but Hellmuth knows that even if the Reds lose, there is always next year. "The future looks good for UMass soccer. We're not graduating many seniors this year, so we'll have a strong base to start with next year."

Unlike most freshman, Hellmuth has not had a lot of trouble making the adjustment to college life. However, since soccer has consumed a large chunk of her time, she does not know what the real college life is like. Hopefully, Hellmuth will have another week of soccer and a prolonged life in soccer this season.

Minutewomen diving for second in rebuilding year

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Correspondent

After an 8-4 finish in 1988-89, the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team led by coach Bob Newcomb returns only three seniors and a host of freshmen to compete against the likes of powerful Boston College.

If Newcomb could return only three seniors, one would certainly be Michele Leary who will always be remembered for her amazing come back after having suffered a heart attack.

"Michele has been through it all," said Newcomb. "She has become probably the finest athlete that has come out of this program. Basically she's going to swim just about anything we need. She specializes in the 50, 100, 200, freestyle and individually medleys are her best events.

"We are looking for Michele to qualify for Nationals, something no one in this program has ever done, and just lead the team mostly by example. When you see her swimming as fast and as far ahead of people as she does, it's easy to say, 'I trained in the same pool as her, why can't I do that too?'"

The other returning seniors who do not receive nearly as much press as Leary are Melissa McCarthy and Cathy Burke. A newcomer to the UMass program from the University of Vermont, Burke has been swimming very well. Between these two and Leary, the locker room should not be lacking leadership.

UMass lost their two best breast strokers to graduation and now must rely on two freshman, Wendy Frimet and Sarah McGorry, along with sophomore Nancy Wilkinson. Junior Leslie Cromwell will help out, after she contributed last year.

In the butterfly, the loss of Sue Gorski due to injury will hurt. "We need a lot of help," said Newcomb. "Jodi Schwartz will be key in our success. We have a lot of other flyers, Maureen Murphy has had a great year so far after a down year last year." Lori Sheehan, Laurie Schwartz and Angie Ng will also swim the fly.

"We have never really been strong in the backstroke, we've never had a lot of people in there to help," said Newcomb. "This year we have a freshman, Kari Edwardsen, who is going to take up a lot of that slack." In case you missed it, Edwardsen in her first meet against Smith broke a freshman record in the backstroke.
Cromwell, McCarthy, and Laurie Schwartz will support Edwardsen in the backstroke.

Newcomb has the luxury of having great depth, a luxury which he calls a 'bonus.' "When you have a lot of different people that can move around, it leaves a lot of versatility in your lineup and leaves the other coaches into wondering what you are going to do," Newcomb said.

The individual medley squad will be led by Laurie Schwartz, Jodi Schwartz, Cromwell and Leary. This core makes for a solid base, and any worries that Newcomb has about this year's team will not be related to this event.

"We are covered the best in the freestyle," said Newcomb, "I have sprinters coming out of my ears, they are also probably the best group of sprinters in New England right now." Leary who won the 50, 100 and 200 last year at the New England Championships leads the sprinters. They will be aided by the addition of Denise Reimer who, "in the past has been every bit as fast as Leary in the 50 and 100," according to Newcomb.

As for the captain of this young but talented team, sophomore Keira Cruz is very talented and is expected to keep pace with both Reimer and Leary. If these three do not get the job done, Newcomb has the option of going to other capable swimmers, such as Frimet, freshmen Rachel Rennert, Teresa Konieczny, or Shannon Connolly.

Tracy Young returning after an impressive freshman campaign and will swim the long distance events. "She's swimming better this year than she was at this time last year," said Newcomb. McCarthy who is swimming "so well" according to Newcomb, joins Young. "This year is going to be her [McCarthy's] year," said Newcomb.

"Diving for the women has always been small, and the loss of Debbie Mullin will hurt," said Newcomb. "Diving is an event that is going to come along slowly, but I think that they are going to be there at the end." Stephanie Tuttle, Heather Leisman, and Beth Wadick will be asked to score points from the platform.

While the club is not a veteran team, and Newcomb has termed this year as a rebuilding one, his aspirations for the team are to post a 10-1 record, the one blemish coming at the hands of mighty Boston College.

"Boston College has more depth than we can handle," said Newcomb, "I also worry about Rhode Island and New Hampshire who have been breathing down our necks since we started beating them a few years ago," said Newcomb.

"Right now, I would say we could be anything from 6-6 to 10-1. As far as championships, we're looking at second again, second is a goal that a lot of these kids have set forward. We cannot stay with Boston College. You have to be realistic, it would be nice to go into BC and say we can beat them, but we can't, they have a thousand different ways to do things, they're three deep and four deep in each event.

If second place is a realistic goal is this really a rebuilding year? Or is UMass potentially a national championship squad. Only time will tell, but UMass is off to a good start beating Smith.

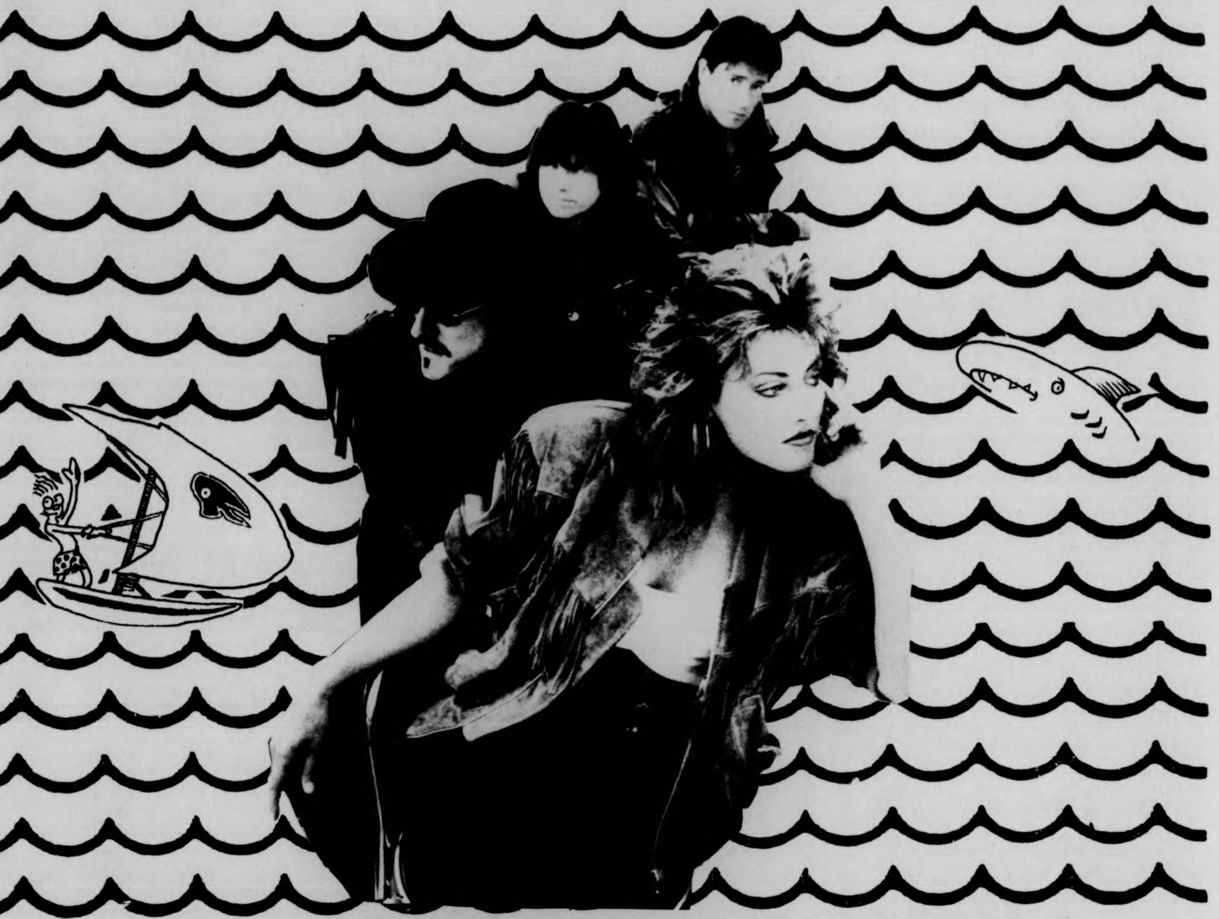
THIS WEEKEND



Katrina rides the wave to Katina's

"Walking On Sunshine." It will go down in history as one of the best all-time summertime tunes. It rates with any Beach Boys song, and regardless what you think of it, if you hear it you become instantly happy.

Katrina and the Waves bring that ultimate pop song, and a slew of others, to Katina's this Saturday night for what is guaranteed to be a bopping good time.

The band got its beginnings in 1976, when Katrina Leskanich met bassist, guitarist and keyboardist Vince de la Cruz in England. The duo played soft rock at military bases. "The point of the whole exercise was to try and sound as much like Pat Benatar and Ann Wilson as one possibly could," remembered Leskanich.

Drummer Alex Cooper, who had formed the group The Waves with guitarist Kimberly Rew (who was in Soft Cell with Robyn Hitchcock), heard Leskanich sing and asked her and de la Cruz to join their band. "Vince and I were pretty much in awe of Alex and Kim," Leskanich said. "I was listening to Linda Ronstadt and Alex was from another planet."

The band learned to combine their talents and were signed to the independent Attic records. When Rew's "Going Down to Liverpool" became a hit for the Bangles, the Waves signed with Capitol.

The title cut from their debut album, Walking on Sunshine, became the monster hit of 1985. Its good time melody, combined with the girl-next-door good looks of Leskanich showing up on MTV every hour, propelled Katrina and the Waves onto stardom. The band had a minor, second hit with "No More Cryin'" and toured for two years.

Then trouble set in. The second album didn't just flop, about the only people who bought the thing was the band members themselves. People had written the band off as one hit wonders who would never be heard from again.

Yet the Waves have crashed back onto shore with the release of their new album Break of Hearts on SBK Records. The albums first single, "That's the Way," has the same summertime fun sound of their first hit and is already soaring up the charts.

But the album is more than just harmless pop. The band proves they can rock out on cuts like "Rock 'n' Roll Girl" and "Rock Myself To Sleep." The lyrics are as trite as the titles, but the music packs a punch.

Cooper said of the new album, "It's a good reflection of where we are now. It gives some intimation of what the band is about live. When our records started getting played around the world, people would say after shows, 'I didn't know you guys were a loud, sweaty, energetic rock band, I thought you guys were a pop band.'"

Leskanich agreed with Cooper and said she had attained her goal with this album. "I wanted to add some balls to everything, she said.

And don't it feel good.

Weingarten's pure poetry

Poetry is the art that the ironically named modern age has the least amount of time for. Why?

Because of every art form known to woman and man thus far, poetry is the one that requires the least amount of artifice; poetry simply is, and nothing technical is allowed through the door. It's a little too real, too affecting, for a world of people endlessly walking around inside themselves.

While only about a year old, The UMass Poetry Society has done more to keep the flickering flame of poetry alight than anything else on this campus. They published the poetry publication Troy last semester, as well as putting on the impressive and highly successful poetry reading by Robert Pinsky at the same time.

And tonight the Society will be hosting a reading by Roger Weingarten of his own work. The author of six books including the transcendental Shadow Shadow, the event should prove to be even more affecting than merely reading the man's thoughts.

"There should be an awareness of what's going on in the world of poetry, and this awareness should be as strong for poetry as it is with other art forms," said Linda Woods, the co-president and co-editor of the Society and Troy, respectively, with Christopher Wysocki, the Society's founder.

"Our rational for bringing Roger Weingarten to campus, as with Pinsky last semester, is that these are the poets who are shaping American poetry," Woods said.

Roger Weingarten will be reading from his works tonight at 8 p.m. in Memorial Hall. He will be tentatively joined by two student poets, Rebecca Wolfs and Joe Pernice. The event is free to the public and is sponsored by the UMass Poetry Society.

Environmentalist Gold gives cold facts on global warming

By REBECCA HOLMES
Collegian Correspondent

The heat is on. Its Global Warming Week at UMass and environmental groups from the Amherst area are coming together to discuss related issues in a series of on campus events, which conclude tomorrow night with a lecture and slide presentation from enviromentalist Lou Gold.

Global warming is an issue with which we are all familiar and phrases such as "the greenhouse effect" roll glibly off the tongue, but what does it all mean?

Global warming occurs when certain gases are released into the atmosphere. Carbon dioxide is the chief offender, and is released by the burning of fossil fuels (oil, coal, natural gas), and by the destruction of the world's forests and woodlands.

Global warming follows the build-up of carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxides, chloroflourocarbons and ground-level ozone. Global temperatures are predicted to rise by as much as five degrees Celsius by the year 2050.

Global warming presents us with sobering concepts. A temperature drop of a mere five degree Celsius accompanied the last Ice-Age when most of the northern hemisphere was covered by thick ice.

Global warming must then be addressed before its consequences become irreversible. Three strategies can end the trend. First, we need radical improvements in energy efficiency. This could be partly achieved in Massachusetts through a bill to further control auto emissions in line with Californian standards. Secondly, by switching from fossil fuels to renewable energy resources we can cut down on dangerous emissions and at the same time find a solution to the problem of finite resources. Finally, a project of reforestation of areas that have been destroyed, and protection of the Earth's remaining rainforests.

As a conclusion to the week's events, Lou Gold, environmentalist and orator, will present "Lessons from the Ancient Forest: Slides and Stories of the Oregon Wilderness" on Friday evening. Gold, who is actively involved in an organization which seeks to establish a Siskiyou National Park in Oregon, will talk about the devastation of temperate rainforests within the United States. At the present rate of cutting, the old-growth forests will be gone in 15-30 years. The mismanagement of the Forestry Service and the profit-motives of the lumber business have combined to rape the forests and to deny the local people any share of the proceeds in a system reminiscent of plantation cashcropping. Meanwhile the government continues to subsidize timber sales, costing the American taxpayer $2 billion over the last ten years, during which some 600,000 acres equivalent of forest in logs were shipped overseas.

Professor Gold's visit is sponsored by the UMass Rainforest Action Group. He will speak in the UMass Campus Center, Room 168 at 8 p.m.

Getting bad and beastly with the furry Manowar

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Fur clad warriors will invade Katina's on Sunday. No, they're not Visigoths. No, they're not Vikings and they're not Huns. They're Manowar, the self proclaimed kings of metal.

They dress in fur loin cloths and other types of ancient warrior attire, to follow with the viking lore imagery of their music. Unfortunately, it is this image that has turned off a lot of potential American fans. While their acceptance in Europe has been Valhalla (Viking heaven) for them, their acceptance in the U.S., with the exception of a large group of devoted fans in New York, has been far from it.

Consisting of vocalist Eric Adams, drummer Scott Columbus, new guitarist David Shankle, and bassist Joey DeMaio, Manowar started in New York in the early 80s. Playing gigs in the New York area, they established a strong following and recorded their first album, Battle Hymns, in 1982. The album was met with critical acclaim and obtained a large audience for them in Europe.

After releasing three more albums, Into Glory Ride (1983), Hail to England (1984), and Sign of the Hammer (1984), they were signed to Alantic records in 1987. Following this, they released Fighting the World, and toured the United States for the first time.

This is the second leg of their current U.S. tour supporting their most recent album, Kings of Metal. This is also the second time they will be playing Katina's. Last time they drew a crowd of about 125 people, and hopes are high that they will draw an even larger crowd this time around.

As for their music, at times it is nothing short of exceptional, especially their earlier material. This is due in part to the awesome vocal ability of Eric Adams, who is world renound for his five-and-a-half octave range, and the astounding work of bassist Joey DeMaio. The dramatic power of songs like "Valhalla" prove that the members of Manowar do have talent.

However, the loin cloths stand in their way. It is sad to see that a band's appearance can block their path to success, no matter how good they are.

Local band Kyruss, will open for Manowar. Their brand of progressive metal is gathering them quite a large local following. Kyruss will go on stage at 9:30 p.m. with Manowar following at 11 p.m. Tickets are $6.

Trustees hike fees $350

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — By a vote of eight to five, the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees voted yesterday to raise UMass- Amherst students' fees by $350 next semester.

Immediately prior to the vote, UMass-Boston student John Gately interrupted the trustees' meeting to make an impassioned plea against the increases.

"You're saying to many of [the students] that they can't go to school next year," Gately, a student senator, said. "If you can do that, and go home in a clear conscience, then vote yes. If you can't . . . vote no."

The trustees voted to raise UMass-Boston students' fees by $200.

Chancellor Duffey said the University will assist UMass-Amherst students who cannot afford the fee increase.

"$800,000 of the [increases] will go into a pool," he said. "Students will have to fill out applications to cover the fee increase, or a portion of it."

However, Duffey said he does not yet know the amount of the additional fee increase students will face. The additional increase would compensate for the state Legislature's withdrawal of trust funds from the University.

The Legislature is cutting back funding from social programs, including public higher education, to balance a budget deficit, which is currently running as high as $720 million.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima pushed to delay the vote. He told the trustees that they would lose students' confidence if they voted on the fee increase without waiting to see if the Rosenberg amendment passes in the Statehouse.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) has forwarded an amendment to revert the $25 million dollar cut to statewide higher education.

Trustees, UM-Boston students like strike

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Board of Trustees members and University of Massachusetts-Boston students voiced support yesterday for the planned UMass-Amherst student strike to protest budget cuts to statewide higher education.

Trustee Ronald Teixeira said he favors the strike.

"It's symbolic," he said. "The state needs to see symbols to understand what the cuts are doing to students of UMass and the whole of public higher education.

"The more you can dramatize the effects of the budget cuts, the better," Teixeira said.

Trustee J. Haines, who voted against the Board's decision to increase student fees, called the idea of a strike "terrific."

"The state ought to assume a greater responsibility for educating students," he said. "The state has lost sight of the fact that UMass is a public university. By making students pay more, we're playing right into the state's hands."

Haines said the student rally in Boston on Oct. 18 had a major impact on the legislature.

Gordon Oakes, chairman of the Board of Trustees, said a strike might send a message to the Statehouse to raise taxes.

"We all have a responsibility to communicate any way we can to the legislature to raise taxes," he said. "For students, it would be better to take the time to come to Boston to have face to face meetings with the legislators."

University of Massachusetts President David Knapp said, "A strike might focus attention on the issues at hand. Whether it would have any political impact is an open

Students: strike to begin Monday

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

With the goal of ending state budget cuts to higher education, 400 people gathered at the Student Union Ballroom last night to organize a campuswide strike they plan to begin Monday morning.

Brought together under the name "The Union of Undergraduates," students called for a freeze to cuts to public education and an end to additional layoffs.

In a statement yesterday, Chancellor Duffey said he does not support the strike, but understands the efforts of students.

"I appeal to students who are considering striking . . . to consider carefully whether their actions will actively and effectively communicate the message they want to send to the public," he said.

Binky Carey Feldman, a strike organizer, said a walkout from classes scheduled for noon today is to be a "day of personal action." The action hopefully will generate student involvement, the momentum needed for a strike planned for Monday, she said.

The walkout will probably be followed by an impromptu rally on the Student Union steps, said Kathy LeMay, a strike organizer.

Organizer Lisa Nelson said, "At 11:55 [a.m.] get your books together. Don't chicken out."

Feldman said the strike will begin Monday at 8 a.m. at the Student Union Ballroom. Organizers will be distributing maps, signs, and schedules for picketing of academic buildings not yet determined.

She anticipated no one will be blocked from entering buildings, though students will be urged to join pickets, she said.

Nelson said each strike day will be filled with activities including teach-ins, educational workshops, films, meetings to organize lobbying trips, phone banking and media outreach.

Duffey among final five choices for U. of Delaware presidency

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Duffey is one of five finalists for the position of president at the University of Delaware, the school's director of public information said yesterday.

Mary Hempel said the search for candidates for the job began one year ago, and the University's Board of Trustees hopes to have a selection made by the end of the year.

Jim Musick, administrative news editor of the University's Review, said the Board of Trustees will meet on Dec. 14, at which time he believes an announcement will be made.

"We suspect they'll decide at the [Dec. 14] meeting. They want to get this done before the end of the calendar year," he said.

Musick said Duffey will visit the University's main campus in Newark on Nov. 16, when he will be interviewed by the Trustee Committee, the Faculty Advisor Committee, the Faculty Senate and the Executive Committee. Duffey will also meet with the Commission on the Status of Women, the Commission to Promote Racial and Cultural Diversity and the Salary Staff Advisory Council, he said.

If Duffey gets the president's position, he will take the office in July, 1990. He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Duffey has been chancellor at the University of Massachusetts since October, 1982. He is a graduate of Marshall University, and holds graduate degrees from Yale University, Andover Newton Theological School and a doctorate from Hartford Seminary Foundation. He served as Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs in the Carter Administration.

A car drives past the Checkpoint Charlie border crossing point in West Berlin last night. Hours before, the Communist East German government announced it was opening its borders to the West, effectively allowing its citizens the right to leave.

East Germans granted first free travel since '61

From the Associated Press

BERLIN — East Germany's embattled Communist leaders said yesterday they would throw open western borders and allow citizens to travel freely anywhere for the first time since the Berlin Wall was erected in 1961.

The move would end decades of fencing in East Germans to prevent their flight to the West and could leave the wall — a symbol of the differences between East and West — as a mere monument to the Cold War. Since 1961, 191 people are known to have died while fleeing to the West from East Germany.

"Open the gate! Open the gate!" chanted about 100 East Berliners who gathered Thursday night at the Brandenburg Gate, the huge monument just over the Berlin Wall in East Berlin.

New Communist leader Egon Krenz also urged a law ensuring free and democratic elections in a desperate attempt to gain control of his control.

More than 200,000 East Germans have fled West so far this year; more than 50,000 have left since Saturday alone. Hundreds of thousands of people have taken to the streets to demand democratic reforms and the end of 40 years of one-party rule.

Guenter Schabowski, a member of the ruling Politburo, said East Germany's heavily fortified frontier with West Germany would be opened as a provisional step until a law is passed to allow East Germans greater freedom of travel.

Schabowski did not say when the law would be passed and it was not immediate-

Author: Jewish intermarriage is kosher

By JAMIE FENNESSY
Collegian Correspondent

Pointing out that the Jewish community "has not always given constructive answers," Rabbi Rachel Cowan discussed intermarriage with a group of about 50 students, faculty members, and area residents at Amherst College Monday evening.

The author of Mixed Blessings; Jews, Christians, and Intermarriage, Cowan has served as program director of Temple Ansche Chesed in New York City, where she now leads workshops for interfaith couples.

> "When intermarriage occurs, very different identities come together. This is not destroying Judaism."
> -Rabbi Rachel Cowan

The discussion, sponsored by the Smith/Amherst Hillel Foundation, focused on the ways that the Jewish community can be more open to non-Jewish spouses and encourage their commitment to Judaism.

Cowan is a Jew by choice, having married into the faith and converting from Unitarianism after 15 years of marriage.

"What has to stop," she told the group, "is the community referring to intermarriage as a disaster."

"Intermarrying is not watering down Judaism," she said. "To the contrary, it is a chance to take Judaism more seriously. It stimulates the Jewish partner to explore his or her faith. It also stimulates the community."

Cowan estimates one out of every three Jews who marry do so with a non-Jew. But she also notes that the divorce rate among intermarried couples is higher than if both partners are Jewish.

"What happens when a Jew and a non-Jew fall in love," she said, "is that the religious issue gets pushed aside because the love is what is important."

She said it is especially true in college.

"There seems to be so many other issues which are important; interfaith relationships just don't seem to be a strong issue," she said. "When these interfaith issues don't get discussed at the beginning of a relationship, problems arise later because people find that they do care about their own faith."

She said one answer to the problem is conversion. But she said the conversion should be done only if it is "meaningful for the partner. It should be meaningful not just to make the marriage smoother, but also to actually learn about the other religion."

Spiritually it should be important, and it ought never be forced, she said.

"When intermarriage occurs, very different identities come together," she said. "This is not destroying Judaism."

"What could, though, is the big change that is occurring through secularization and assimilation; and it will become problematic if there are too many Jews who don't care," she added.

Solution for Greenhouse Effect debated

By JAMIE FENNESSY
Collegian Correspondent

The Greenhouse Effect, according to several speakers at the University of Massachusetts, are simple words that will lead many people to make difficult choices.

"The greenhouse effect is one question we feel we cannot wait for all the answers on," said Howard Schaefer, a representative of Northeast Utilities. "The consequences of waiting and being wrong are too great."

The world could be a much warmer place in the next century if people do not change their lifestyles now, say the speakers. The two-hour forum, "The Greenhouse Effect, Energy Choices and You," was sponsored by the Union of Concerned Scientists.

Scientists say global warming is caused by gases released into the atmosphere by human activities, especially by the burning of fossil fuels. Several gases are responsible, the most important being carbon dioxide, which is released by the burning of coal, oil, and natural gas.

Other important greenhouse gases are methane and various types of chlorofluorocarbons. Bradley pointed out that carbon dioxide levels have risen 25 percent in the last 150 years.

The central debate at the discussion was one of deciding which route to follow to find a solution to the Greenhouse Effect: switching from fossil fuels to nuclear energy, or energy conservation and efficiency as an interim decision until a better solution is found.

"We don't want to compromise our lifestyles, even though there are global consequences," said UMass climatology professor Ray Bradley. "We live in a greenhouse world, without it we wouldn't be here. But we have to be careful."

MassPIRG Energy Program Director Alan Nogee said nuclear energy was not the answer.

"The best and immediate solution is energy efficiency," he said. "If we replace all the lighting, air conditioning and other electrical uses we could reduce the amount of electricity use by [33 percent to 50 percent]."

Author Richard Rudolf said switching to nuclear energy would just create new environmental problems. He said the problem is with the electrical utilities not being energy efficient.

Schaefer said the Greenhouse Effect was too large a problem to spend years studying without first making preliminary decisions. "We must now move ahead with nuclear energy" before it is too late, he said.

Bradley said that while making the state, and even the country have stricter air quality laws is a good thing, people should be focusing on the global consequences.

"Global warming is a global issue," he states, "It's not just a national problem. We should be focusing our attention on the Third World countries because that's where the biggest problems will arise in the future."

"These countries are poor and will be using fossil fuels and nuclear energy in non-efficient ways," he said. "They are not interested in making energy efficient homes, they simply want homes. We must get the Third World to address these issues, because right now they are trivial to them."

Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) then pointed to some pending bills in the state Legislature, including his own, which "hopefully will reduce the emission of these damaging gases."

The bills, if passed, would call for the recycling of CFCs emitted from automobile air conditioners and give Massachusetts the strictest air quality laws in the country.

"We as a country must do something," Rosenberg said. "The U.S. is only 5 percent of the world's population, yet we produce 25 percent of the emissions that cause the greenhouse effect. If these bills are passed, hopefully by the year 2000 Massachusetts could have a CO2 neutral state."

'Night of broken glass' commemorated tonight

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

The Reform Jewish Chavurah will commemorate the 51st anniversary of Kristallnacht, or "night of broken glass" tonight at 7 p.m. in the Dukes room of the Student Union.

Professor of history David S. Wyman said Kristallnacht occurred on Nov. 9, 1938, when the Nazi government began a nationwide pogrom which brought some 30,000 German Jews to concentration camps.

"This was not the beginning of the mass extermination, but was the handwriting on the wall of what the Nazis did to the Jews," Wyman said.

Wyman said the massacre continued into the early hours of Nov. 10.

"This said to Jews in Germany that it was not safe for them to be there," Wyman said. "It said to the rest of the world that things were getting out of hand and something had to be done soon; unfortunately the world did not open its doors."

The name Kristallnacht was taken because it was said that the streets were shining like crystal after plate glass windows of thousands of Jewish shops were smashed and looted, Wyman said.

Men, women, and children were beaten and dragged out of their homes, Wyman said. About 30 people were killed, he said.

Personal property and approximately 300 synagogues were burned that night, Wyman said.

"This signifies the most violent eruption in Nazi Germany until this time [1938]," Wyman said.

Hillel Program Director Yehudit Heller said it is important to remember this event because, "It was the first stone on a long road of evil and pain and cruelty that hurt so many people."

"We have to make it clear to the Legislature that we're not just taking time off to party," she said.

Organizer Michael Currier said he has been calling professors, urging a "nonstop teach-in." Though not in class, students will learn from professors outside of class, he said.

Nelson said, "We need to dispel the myth that we're not organized." Faculty support is important right now, she said.

The President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors and UMass Professor of Anthropology John W. Cole have called a meeting of the MSP executive committee for this morning to discuss the strike.

Cole, who does not advocate the strike said, "I am going to recommend to my colleagues that they not penalize students if they participate in the strike."

Professor of Communications Sut Jhally said he supports the strike.

Jhally said individual professors cannot make a blanket statement on the actions of all professors, but he will not penalize any student who misses either one of the two exams he has scheduled for Tuesday.

Organizer Rachael Maiore said, "My fellow students, the Union of Undergraduates was born out of desperation. We cannot afford to be sheep marching to our own slaughter. In 72 hours there will be 5,000 students saying no to budget cuts and no to layoffs and yes to strike."

She said the demands to stop the cuts and block fee increases are simple and reasonable. She said, "We're not going to give them one more penny," as a member of the audience shouted, "some of us don't have one more penny."

Nelson said that UMass has to tell the other state campuses what's going on here.

"I have absolute confidence that once UMass goes on strike all 28 campuses will follow," she said.

Maiore said, "Education should not live or die according to political whim. The fight for education is not just for students, but for the parents who have worked hard to send their children to school."

THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS

India: One-fifth of humanity goes to the polls

WHERE? India (a triangular landmass in South Asia protruding into the Indian Ocean.)

WHEN? Nov. 22 and Nov. 4, 1989.

WHO? Four hundred and ninety-eight million voters, including, for the first time, 35 million in the 18-21 age group (the total population of India is about 850 million).

The sheer number of humans involved makes this the largest electoral exercise in human history. Admittedly, there are no white voters involved. Admittedly, Indian elections may not mean much to the collective psyche of America that soulfully peers out of the eyes of Messrs. Ted Koppel and Dan Rather. Nonetheless, this election constitutes a landmark in Third World history.

THE MAJOR PLAYERS:

CONGRESS: A party that is the personal fiefdom of the Nehru/Gandhi dynasty that has ruled India for all but two years since the sun finally set on the British Raj in 1947. This ruling party represents a powerful nexus of ruthless corporate bosses, semi-feudal landowners and a nouveau-rich urban elite. All this symbolized in the persona of the current dynastic incumbent Rajiv Gandhi (no relation to Attenborough's Gandhi). If he loses this time (as well he may), his legacy to an impoverished nation will include designer sunglasses, IBM PC clones, and memories of an Italian First Lady linked to arms dealers and the caviar-consuming international jet-set.

Of greater consequence to the Indian people are the following developments during his reign: a) A corrupt deal with a Swedish gun-maker, involving about 0.1 billion dollars of payoffs to the highest officials in the land. b) An alarming increase in the national debt. c) Explosive ethnic strife as manifested in bloody conflicts in the provinces of Punjab, Kashmir and parts of the North East d) An "enlightened" foreign policy that has led to a disastrous Vietnam-style military intervention in the neighboring island of Sri-Lanka, an economic blockade of India's tiny landlocked neighbor, Nepal. e) A staggeringly expensive conventional and nuclear build-up of the Indian military arsenal.

Bose/Dastidar

THE JANATA DAL (The People's Party): A peculiar conglomerate formed by the merger of several center-right groups that have allied with regional parties to topple Congress (possibly their own common goal). Their leader is Vishwanath Pratap Singh, a defector from Gandhi's inner circle. His main campaign theme is an end to corruption in the government.

BHARATIYA JANATA PARTY (The Indian People's Party): A Hindu Fundamentalist entity that is the political front for a militant theological organization called the RSS, which believe in a Glorious Hindu India and views minorities, especially Muslims, as alien intruders benignly tolerated by the Hindu majority. The BJP has gained significant ground in recent months as Hindu-Muslim tensions have escalated.

THE INDIAN LEFT: Dominated by the Communist Party of India (Marxist) which controls two of India's 26 provincial governments. It's mass base is limited to these two provinces, Kerala and West Bengal.

POSSIBLE SCENARIOS:

1) Congress is re-elected with a drastically reduced majority in Parliament. Predictions for the future? Increased centralization of power, with autocratic party bosses using divide and rule tactics and promoting Orwellian intelligence agencies. Debt and military expansionism on the rise.

2) An unholy coalition between the Janata Dal, regional parties and the fundamentalist BJP. Predictions for the future? An effort to devolve powers to the provincial governments, increased violence against minorities and a pro-United States foreign policy.

3) A coalition between the Janata Dal, its regional allies, and the Left. Predicitions for the future? An effort to devolve powers to the provinces, and a collapse of this government over conflicting moral and political objectives.

In conclusion, there is little immediate help for the betterment of India's poverty-stricken masses and alienated minorities. Can this ostensibly democratic electoral process pave the way to a truly federal union of culturally diverse provinces? Can it ensure a better deal for the hundreds of millions that lack the basic amenities of life? The entire Third World will await answers to these questions.

Interview with an Eritrean on 28-year long struggle

By ROBIN VARGHESE
Collegian Staff

Eritrea has waged an armed struggle against the Ethiopian government for the past 28 years. In 1952, following the end of the British mandate over the region, the new state of Ethiopia annexed Eritrea under a 12-year agreement. Under the agreement, the two parties would exist in a federation in which the cultural and national integrity of Eritrea was to be preserved. In 1960, Ethiopia forbade the displaying of the Eritrean flag and banned Eritrean press and publications, violating the 1952 agreement.

Hassan Abdul-Kerim is an Eritrean student at UMass.

Collegian: When Ethiopia violated the terms of the 1952 agreement, the first resistance came from the peasantry. Only in 1964 did the urban workers and students join the struggle. Why the lag?

Abdul-Kerim: Urban workers and students had hoped for a solution within the political framework. Eventually, it became clear that this was unlikely. We still want peace and have always been willing to talk to them.

Collegian: The recent peace talks, which took place in September in Atlanta, between Eritrea and Ethiopia were the the first. Why do you think that Ethiopia, after years of refusing, agreed to talks without pre-conditions?

Abdul-Kerim: Basically, the Ethiopians agreed to the talks because of EPLF (Eritrean People's Liberation Front) military pressure. In 1988, Ethiopia suffered a massive defeat. There were 18,000 Ethiopian casualties. We also captured 10,000 POWs and three Soviet advisors. As a result of the defeat, a demoralized and frustrated Ethiopian military attempted a coup d'etat this year, demanding a cease-fire. The coup failed, and Haile-Mariem had 38 of generals executed. Ethiopia agreed to the talks to buy time.

Collegian: So, you question the sincerity of the peace talks which are to take place in Kenya on Nov. 21?

Abdul-Kerim: The Ethiopians are rebuilding their army, but we have always been ready and willing to talk.

Collegian: Who supports you?

Abdul-Kerim: Materially, we are self-sufficent. Eritreans abroad send money. We make our own pharmaceuticals and baby food. We also have our own hospitals. Progressive gorups sympathize with us.

Collegian: How much of Eritrea is presently in your control?

Abdul-Kerim: Between 85 and 95 percent of Eritrea is controlled by the EPLF. In 1977, the Eritrean resistance controlled 95 percent, but the Ethiopians pushed us back with massive Soviet aid. The EPLF has regained most of it.

Collegian: If the Soviets were to withdraw support for Ethiopia, how do you think the situation would change?

Abdul-Kerim: Without the Soviets, the Ethiopian hold on us would be impossible. While Gorbachev is cutting aid to progressive Third World movements, he has just renewed aid to Ethiopia.

Collegian: What does Eritrea seek?

Abdul-Kerim: We would like a referendum in Eritrea in which the Eritrean people would choose either total independence, greater autonomy, or the present union with Ethiopia, but no one would want that.

Groups protest Israeli general

By EYAD KISHAWI
Collegian Correspondent

The presence of a controversial Israeli in Massachusetts has sparked a protest movement among Palestinian supporters and other Massachusetts residents.

General Armram Mitzna, military commander of the West Bank from May 1987 to June 1989, is presently a fellow at Harvard's Center for International Affairs, researching how to manage and govern a state with civil unrest.

The General Union of Palestinian Students, a national organization with chapters at several Universities, stated last month that Mitzna "bears direct responsibility for the atrocities that violate both the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

According to the human rights organizations Amnesty International and Physicians for Human Rights, more than 600 Palestinians were shot, 115 of them children under the age of 14, and some 25,000 people were arrested in the course of Mitzna's two-year military governorship. Some 500 Palestinian homes were demolished as a form of collective punishment, and more than 50 Palestinians were expelled, the human rights organizations reported. Both practices are forbidden by international law.

News Analysis

Physicians for Human Rights has also reported hundreds of cases of miscarriages resulting from the use of tear gas. Tear gas was shot into houses during curfews, they reported.

The Coalition for Palestinian Rights, a Boston-based organization, stated recently, "Ironically, it was on Mitzna's watch that Palestinian grade schools, high schools, and universities were closed indefinitely, and some of the schools were turned into makeshift detention camps."

"Yet, Harvard University has rewarded this man, whom many consider a war criminal, with a scholarly appointment," they continued.

Both human rights organizations received reports of sexual molestation of women during arrests and in prison. They also reported the subjection of traditional Muslim women to humiliations such as the witnessing of pornography.

Both human rights organizations and international observers have also pointed out thousands of cases of house arrests for months at a time, leading to the starving out of villages, interruption of vaccination campaigns, and policies causing the spread of dysentery.

ly clear when the borders would be opened. He also said East Germany was not yet ready to tear down all its barriers.

The decision, made during a Central Committee meeting, means all East Germans "can travel over all East German border checkpoints," including through the Berlin Wall, Schabowski told reporters in East Berlin.

Those who want to emigrate can go to West Germany directly without having to go through a third country, Schabowski said. East Germans have been fleeing through Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland.

Schabowski said those who only want to visit the West need visas, but that those should be issued quickly. He mentioned no limit about the length of stay abroad.

The office that issue travel visas closed for the night by the time Schabowki made the historic announcement, and it was not known whether visas would be issued at border crossing. There were no immediate reports of East Germans pouring directly into West Gerlin or West Germany.

There was no unusual activity at the Berlin Wall an hour after the announcement. Visitors at Checkpoint Charlie, the crossing used by foreigners, said it was quiet as was the Friedrichstrasse railroad crossing.

East Germans reacted to the news with astonishment and jubilation.

UMass-Boston Student Senator John Gately said he "most certainly" supports a student strike, adding that such a strike could spread to the Boston campus.

UMass-Boston Student Trustee Richard Rooney said he supports a strike.

"Go for it," he said. "It will help release students' frustration, at least."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Are we on an aimless search for civility?

We should expect civility

Civility is not something that is to be put up on pedestal for one week out of the year, such as a fiasco like Civility Week. Civility is a way of life born our of respect for those around us. It transcends any form of racism or phobia — this includes anti-caucasian sentiment and heterophobia.

I don't even like the word "civility." Try "respect," "courtesy," or "common decency." The word "common" is key here — translate it as "everyday" or "normal."

Sean Slattery

Unfortunately many people don't even have the grace to evoke common courtesy.

I don't like being asked to think about things that I made decisions about years ago. These things include racism and homophobia. They are, or should be, clear cut.

Racism is wrong. There is so much evidence supporting this idea that argument surrounding the issue is redundant. The question now is to pinpoint the sources of racism and eliminate them.

To the dismay of many liberals and minority activists, some of these sources are to be found inside the liberal and minority community.

Racism is an ugly attitude that isn't restricted to the majority race.

The issues surrounding homophobia are not so clear cut, but the term is often misused to describe individuals who are at odds with the homosexual community, or more often, with the political voice of the homosexual support groups.

I do not like being called homophobic because I do not wish to support homosexual causes. I am not afraid of homosexuals, or any other person or group of people for any reason. I simply do not agree with the arguments being made.

The term "heterosexism" is one I do not like, mainly because it and "homophobia," are left unbalanced by the terms "homosexism" and "heterophobia."

Civility Week also fails because it collectivizes individuals by race, sexual preference, or theological/philosophical beliefs. It is not necessarily important what you are, but who you are.

There is a disgusting trend to credit someone for what they have done because of what they are. If a homosexual person accomplishes something, the press tends to stress the person's homosexual identity before recognizing that the person in question may have done quite a bit of work, and while others who accomplish are often independent of this kind of identity.

It is appalling to think that a Black man receives his doctorate because he is Black, rather than because he is an intelligent individual with finely trained academic skills.

Yet this is the kind of thing that is being subtly said by the press is evident in the media surrounding Civility Week.

Another problem I have with Civility Week is that it awashes with "holier tham thou" attitudes. It has placed a number of people in positions to flaunt their politically fashionable attitudes in a manner that is similar to mooning a theater crowd.

To these people, I say "Get a clue, get a life."

Civility is not something that is taught in a week, but over a lifetime. It is timeless.

We do not need to highlight social consciousness for one week, but live aware of the sensitivities of those around us.

Civility should not be treated as something that is special, but as something is expected.

What good is Civility Week?

This is my junior year at UMass, and if I may say, its been hell on earth being a minority on a White campus.

I've been the victim of racial discrimination several times. When Civility Week was first introduced, I thought to myself, "Boy, what a relief. Finally something is being done to promote race relations at UMass!"

So I started to fantasize with a Civility Week, that ignorant people will change their attitudes and overcome their ignorances toward the belief that inferiority is based on physical characteristics and skin color. Most of all, I fantasized when my friends and I are returning to our room from a Friday night party, just maybe, we might not get chased and beaten.

Ha, ha, ha.

The question that we are debating is whether or not Civility Week is necessary. To answer this question, we need to go more in-depth and ask, what good is Civility Week? Has it proven effective in the past?

And by answering the effectiveness of past Civility Weeks, I ask, what makes you think this year's Civility Week turned out a major success in bringing the students in unity?

I urge you to think through these answers, with time to take historical fact into account.

Eugene Barros

First, and most important of all historically, Civility Week at UMass has proven to be major failure in remedying race relations.

Ask yourselves how many racial incidents have happened at UMass since Civility Week was introduced back in 1987.

Knock, knock, is anybody there?

Come on people, let's face it, in the end, Civility Week is nothing but crap and pure sham. Yeah I know, on Civility Week people go around campus acting nice, saying "hi" to everyone and giving you that fake smile pretending they are saints. But after Civility Week is over, the Ku Klux Klan spirit is back once again, makes me wonder if it ever left.

Ask yourselves, do we really need only one Civility Week a year to be polite to each other? What about the 51 weeks that lie ahead of us?

Since we are a small percentage of minorities on this campus, it's probably not wise to start defending ourselves violently, then should we start to run 10 miles a day to be physically fit and be prepared to run when the wild goose-chase returns?

Hey, I don't know about you man, but I've been doing some daily running, and just for the record here, I want to point out that I've been taking jogging every semester since my freshman year. I just hope it pays off when I need it most, you know what I mean?

Like Pete Ribeiro said, "Civility Week has no meaning to me, and I have no respect for it."

Right on brother, I'm witcha.

Eugene Barros is a UMass student

The Editorial desk accepts submissions from UMass and the Five College area. Letters must be no longer than 45 typed lines (double-spaced), and columns must NOT exceed 65 typed lines. ALL submissions become property of the* Collegian *and are subject to editing. Because of the number of submissions and a shortage of space, writers should wait at least a week before checking on the status of a letter or column that has not run.

Racism has no boundaries

The weather last week was beautiful, not too hot not too cold. Frisbees flew through the air, ducks chased after popcorn, girls wore miniskirts and guys wore tank tops.

It was Indian summer and the peace and sunshine warmed even the coldest hearts. Most importantly, it was Civility Week, and who could ask for better conditions for hands across UMass? The sight of hundreds of students of all color, creed and sex bonded together, singing songs of peace, produces goose-bumps.

I decided to to buy myself something to eat in the hatch. It was empty and quiet, enabling the few conversations being held to be overheard.

The conversation I overheard was among several Black students discussing transferring schools. They expressed interest in quite a few schools, but the list was quickly shortened. They made rough estimates as to how many Whites attended each of them, then cut the list to a handful of schools with a desirable number of Whites.

Their conversation was peppered with remarks like, "Yeah, not too many Whites go there," and "How many whites go there?"

At first I was shocked that people would compromise their valuable education by choosing their school by the degree of a certain skin color within the student body.

I was also insulted by these results. As a member of the White race I felt I was being judged, grouped and shunned because of a skin color. I pride myself on being a human being who tries to be free of all prejudices. It's a shame that people have to put so much stress on their belonging to a certain race instead of being proud of being in the human race.

Instead of preaching "White power," or "Black power," people should spend their time preaching "People Power."

Through the media in the Pioneer Valley, students attentions are drawn toward White racism toward Black's. Racism is not a one way street of White against Black, instead it is a multi-laned expressway with no medians, inviting death and destruction. If nothing else, I hope that Civility Week has opened the University of Massachusetts' eyes to the fact that racism hurts everyone.

What was aim of Civility Week?

The success or failure of Civility Week really depends on what its aim was. During Civility Week, UVC ran a video tape of Louis Farrakhan, which raises the following issue: Does Civility week aim to promote tolerance through education abut different groups, or only education about different groups?

Seeing the Farrakhan tape gives a viewer a fair idea of what he is all about, but leaves the viewer with neither a felling of pride of his or her own ethnic background, nor an appreciation of any other ethnic background.

The reason is, regardless of what Farrakhan said in the tape, his tradition of dehumanizing Jews and Christians precedes him.

Overall, Civility Week was a success because other programs emphasized tolerance through understanding. If the real aim of Civility week was only education about different groups, then in the future it should be restricted to exclude people who can't offer every UMass student freedom from biased hatred, or who only offer partial civility.

Mitchell Kotler

Farrakhan builds barriers

We were very disappointed to see Farrakhan's speech from UMass last semester televised as part of the Civility Week activities.

Many people work together to make Civility Week a time to educate — a time to break down the barriers of ignorance.

Louis Farrakhan builds barriers between peoples. It is obvious from the over 3,000 people who protested his appearance at our university, that he is a man who divides people.

Farrakhan has referred to Jews as "narrow-minded" and said "I will crush them to bits."

When speaking about Christians he said that they, "preach love, but practice hate and tyranny, use God to cover up their corrupt and dirty practices."

In his speech at UMass, Farrakhan spoke about women as if they were possessions. He has repeatedly threatened the lives of Blacks and others who have challenged his racist views.

The showing of Farrakhan's speech as part of Civility Week is a slap in the face to everyone working to end the bigotry and hate that exists on our campus. Next time, before you pop in a video tape, think of what the consequences of that tape are to minorities and others who have been hurt by Farrakhan's words and actions, and to the spirit of Civility Week.

The Junkie looks at flies, orphans and Gumby

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

The end of the decade is looming ominously; time is running out for bands to make exciting, vibrant musical statements. With this in mind, we turn to an L.A. band called Flies on Fire. Their claim to fame is having won MTV's Basement Tapes. They claim their music to be "not the usual tired cliches, but immediate classics." Would you like to take a guess at what it sounds like? How about punk reggae? Maybe Judy Collins done heavy metal? Industrial string quartet? No! It's the same old crap we've been getting forever, with no original thought whatsoever. They've got one good song title — "Baptize Me Over Elvis Presley's Grave," but the song itself stinks. In fact, the whole thing stinks like last weekend's garbage. We shouldn't even waste another column inch on these bozos.

DISC JUNKIE

On the other hand, Shelleyan Orphan have lots of new things to say. Their latest album, Century Flower invests catchy songs with unique woodwind and string arrangements. The opening track, "Shatter" features some gorgeous double bass and piano work, plus Caroline Crawley's disarmingly wonderful childlike voice. "Summer Flies" is a subtle jazz shuffle over Crawley and Jemaur Tayle's duet. The wonderful thing about this record is how different it sounds from everything else. The originality of the arrangements stand out from the muddy swamp of contemporary sounds. However, it's not a perfect album. Some songs ("Tar Baby") drag around in the mud, but even on these slips, at least the group is taking chances. Last up is a compilation put together by Buena Vista Records. It's called Gumby and for reasons best known to the brains behind it, all the songs are about Art Clokey's bizarre little claymated monster known as Gumby.

The quality of the songs varies wildly. Dweezil and Moon Unit Zappa contribute an oddly uninventive rocker called "(In Love) With You Gumby." We've never been fans of zydeco, so those tracks don't grab us. However, Sly and Robbie donate an excellent techno-dub, "Gumby, We Love You;" Rick Schulman contributes the completely bizarre "Ballad of Gumby" which will be very familiar to anyone who's heard "The Ballad of Irving (The 142nd Fastest Gun in the West);" Flo and Eddie provide the humorous Beatlemania, "We All Are Gumby" replete with "I Am the Walrus' effects and a "Penny Lane" trumpet solo. Closing the album is Frank Sinatra, Jr.'s full band version of "The Gumby Heart Song (original TV theme)." We are rather at a loss to explain this album. If you find yourself with an inexplicable urge to hear ten rather diverse readings of the Gumby ethos, then check it out.

Calvin combines today's films with yesterday's ambiance

By ALEXANDRA REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

For history buffs and moviegoers alike, the Calvin Theater in Northampton is one of the area's best kept secrets. The Calvin is a second-run theater house, showing feature films that have already peaked at the box office.

Built in 1924 and named for former president Calvin Coolidge, the theater was a local mecca for socialites in its heyday and now shows movies to the public for bargain prices. Admission is only $2.50, and $.99 on Wednesdays.

A visit to the Calvin is pleasant with an historical flavor and a few little extras. The soda and popcorn prices are what you'd expect, but consider that some of the proceeds going towards janitorial expenses; the theater is very clean. Since the Calvin rarely houses sellout crowds, patrons have their pick of seats without having to walk down sugar-and-butter-coated aisles or kick aside empty candy boxes. There is plenty of leg room to comfortably enjoy the show, although the thin-cushioned seats are not nearly as cozy as the marshmallow-type recliners in most theaters.

The air-conditioning unit from the 1939 World's Fair is still in working order, and the building is still heated by steam radiators. Viewing a movie from the balcony would make the show a little more fun, but seating is restricted to the lower level. The balcony, which seats an additional 500, has been closed to the public due to problems in the past with inconsiderate patrons.

Perhaps the key to the theater's well preserved quality has to do with its history. The theater is still an attractive fixture in Northampton and has been part of a family business since its opening. Samuel Goldstein owned and operated the Calvin before passing it on to his son and daughter-in-law. The Calvin was once eyed for ownership by the Hotel Northampton, but it was not open for sale at the time and talks never moved past the preliminary stage.

Manager Richard Dupont continues the historical legacy of the Calvin. "Our staff has a lot of pride in this building," he said.

For all the caretaking the building receives, it is not immune from the effects of time. A large chandelier that once hung from the high ceiling has been removed and the structure is susceptible to water leakage in very heavy rain. The Calvin has the potential to be restored to its original grandeur, however the cost of such major renovations would be enormous.

Situated within minutes of the Pleasant Street Theater and the Academy of Music, one may expect the Calvin Theater in constant competition for public attendance. Not so, said Dupont. The three Northampton Theaters all show different types of films. "Our audience is ours, and their audience is theirs," he said.

While the Calvin features movies geared toward commercial audiences, the Pleasant Street and Academy present quality foreign films, documentaries, and less mainstream comedies and dramas.

The Calvin no longer sponsors live productions or shows (Arlo Guthrie gave a concert about five years ago), but the orchestra pit, complete with trap door, is still intact. Easy listening music from WRCH has replaced the sounds of an orchestra tuning up before the show, but a bit of the past is till retained in the antique atmosphere and low cost of a trip to the Calvin Theater.

Exploring the many faces of Africa through fun

The African Student Organization, in conjunction with the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund, is offering an evening of entertainment and enlightenment for people of all cultural backgrounds, as they play host to African Cultural Night on Saturday.

ASO Vice-President Nwando Achebe said, "We're basically sharing parts of our culture with a wider audience. We want people to see African culture as it really is. All the American media shows is children dying in Africa, famine in the Sudan and wildlife in Kenya. We are a continent of 53 countries, and we're the second largest continent in the world. We're three-and-a-half times larger than North America."

Achebe stressed that Africa is not a country, but a continent. "In Nigeria alone, we have over 300 languages which are distinct from one another," she said.

ASO member Lola Ogunyemi added that many African countries are not the underdeveloped, starving nations that are depicted on American television. "The average per capita income is higher in Libya than it is in the United States," she said. "We're trying to have people see us for what we are, because we have too much negative publicity," Achebe said.

The free event, which begins at 5:30 p.m. in Hampden Theater, offers a wide array of activities. For two hours, people are invited to sample exotic African food from the many different countries, as well as view a variety of crafts and exhibits.

The many unique and exciting shows begin at 7:30 p.m., with dance, music, story and a fashion show. The Nigerian Women's Dance Troupe, based in New England, and Shaka Zulu, a South African dance troupe based in New York, will perform electrifying African traditional dances. This will be followed by a fashion/modeling show and a performance by Barwa, a South African group of Freedom Singers that are similar to Ladysmith Black Mambazo. Folk tales will then be told by, Harriet Masembe, an Ugandan professor at Middlesex Community College. "We have an oral tradition of folk," Achebe said. "We don't write down our folk tales."

People will then be given the opportunity to learn contemporary African dance to the tunes of Fela and Youssou N'Dour, among others. African students will give the lessons.

And you'll really want those lessons because after that, the real party begins. From 10 p.m. until DJ Flashy Flash (Bernard Nketia) runs out a wax, people will be dancing and partying in the Southside room. The dance costs $2.

"This is our chance to get down and boogie," said Achebe.

The ASO is hoping for a good showing, with a variety of people. "It's a good chance for people of African descent to join hands with us," Nketia said.

Hypnotist puts you to sleep for laughs

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Hypnotist John Sacco, in what could only be called an amazing show, wowed the standing room only crowd at the Campus Center Auditorium on Wednesday night.

Sacco, who has practiced hypnotism for 12 years, opened the show by explaining that he was going to "unhypnotize" the crowd from the influence of television and other stimuli and bring the audience to a new place and time.

"Think of me as a travel agent," he said in his rich, smooth voice. "Think of my voice as a ticket out of Amherst."

Judging by the mass of people who ran to the stage when Sacco called for participants, it seems UMass students are dying to get away. About 40 people rushed to the stage but only about 15 people lasted through the over two hour show sponsored by the Board of Governors.

Sacco warned that not everyone could be hypnotized since to be a good subject one must have the ability to concentrate,to imagine and let go and trust him.

"If you can't relax and concentrate, you just can't do this," said Henry Leibovitz, a junior engineering student who has been hypnotized by Sacco three times.

Sacco, who is by day an educational consultant, began the hypotism by playing soothing music to his subjects and asking them to close their eyes, hold out their hands and tightly grasp them. He said the harder they tried to pull their hands apart, the tighter the grip would become.

After talking to them for less than ten minutes, he went around the stage shaking their hands down to their laps and commanding, "Sleep." Nearly every participant's head fell to the side or forward, to the astonishment of the audience.

Then Sacco in the role of travel agent took these tourists on a long journey from the beach, to a fishing trip, to a carnival at UMass, to Jupiter and back to UMass.

One of the most interesting events of the night was a man in the back of the hall who also fell under the commanding influence of this hypnotist. The man was placed under a post hypnotic suggestion that whenever Sacco said "UMass-Amherst" the man screamed out "Hip, Hip, Hooray."

Later, to emphasize the potential power of hypnotism, Sacco told the man to forget his name, then he asked him an unrelated question and then quickly asked him again, "Now, what's your name?" The audience remained silent in awe as the man, in painful disbelief, said nothing.

"It's just amazing," said participant Brian Sauer, a sophomore psychology major. "You know what is going on to you the whole time, you can hear him but you are at such a point of concentration that you just do whatever he says."

Sauer, who is trying to give up smoking, was also placed under a post hypnotic suggestion by Sacco to be repelled by smoking. When he placed a cigarette to his lips after he was waken by Sacco he threw it to the stage in disgust. "He has just saved me $14 a week," he said.

Tonight I'll sleep so good, so deep," commented Leibovitz, a member of the group. "And for weeks afterward I can concentrate so much better. I study in the dorms and the noise won't bother me."

HEALTH & SCIENCE

The issues of contraceptives are complex and require a lot of consideration. Often, there are many variables involved and decision-making can be difficult. Before making important sexual decisions, you should find all the information you need. Here are a few little-known or often forgotten facts to keep in mind:

- At UMass, many of the sexually active women in heterosexual relationships choose oral contraceptives (the 'Pill') as their method of birth control.
- Anyone considering using the oral contraceptive method needs to know that while the Pill is an effective contraceptive, it offers no protection from sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) such as AIDS or chlamydia, for either partner.

ASK US

- While the incidences of some STDs' infection and diagnoses are decreasing on this campus, pregancy is on the rise.
- While the use of condoms is encouraged to prevent STD transmission, another 'back up' method should be used. A contraceptive sponge, gel spermicide (inside or out of the condom), or vaginal film are just a few of the choices. More information can be attained at a contraception workshop (held at Health Services.
- It is important to remember not all STDs have visible symptoms and could be passed on unknowingly.
- Cold sores or fever blisters are oral herpes, a similar strain of the genital infection. If the partner with a cold sore performs oral sex on his/her partner, the oral virus could be transmitted to the partner's genitals. To prevent this, a condom or dental dam can be used or oral sex can be forgone until the blister(s) are gone.
- A dental dam is a square of latex (same material as a condom but thicker) about 6' x 6". The university pharmacy sells plain and bubble gum flavored. It is used as a barrier to protect against the exchange of body fluids during cunnilingus (oral sex on a woman). Everyone and anyone engaging in cunnilingus should use dental dams.
- If a dental dam is unavailable, a non-lubricated condom's tip can be cut off and the condom cut up on one side to create a rectangular piece of latex, easily placed and held, as a dental dam, over a woman's vulva (vagina and surrounding area) during cunnilingus.
- While not on the market yet, some manufacturers are developing "female condoms." This latex device is strapped on the legs and over the entire vulva. There have been no studies on its comfort or effectiveness.

Questions on the above information or on other areas of sexuality can be directed to Gretchen Krull, director of the Peer Sexuality Program at University Health Services.

Study looks at families with mental illness

By JOYCE TING
Collegian Correspondent

When mental illness strikes, both the patient and the family suffer, according to a University of Massachusetts professor conducting a study on the impact of mental illness on families.

Richard Tessler, part of the UMass' Social and Demographic Research Institute, received a grant of $625,526 from the National Institute of Mental Health to conduct his study, which focusses on how mental illness may increase the burden upon families of the mentally ill.

"Studies are always focused on the patients while the family is overlooked. Families are the missing piece, yet they're so involved with the patients," Tessler said.

He added, "Their role hasn't been acknowledged, but I'm trying to bring them back in the picture in a way respectful to their role and position."

Tessler said he used a non-blame approach with families because often people wrongly assume that family members are to blame. Each family has their own attitudes about their responsibilities to the mentally ill, he said.

The families chosen for the study have someone who is severely mentally ill, he said. Severe mental illness includes schizophrenia, major depression, or any impairing illnesses. Out of the families chosen, 46 percent are Afro-American.

These families are all working class with no considerable amount of resources, Tessler said. The study has chosen families from three cities in Ohio: Cincinnati, Toledo, and Columbus.

Tessler has received permission from the patients to conduct interviews with four identified family members. This study will take three years.

The research is being done in collaboration with the Institute of Survey Research of Temple University as well as the University of Maryland Medical School.

Tessler and his co-researcher, UMass professor Gene Fisher will eventually coordinate all the information from the three institutions.

Tessler said, "This should give us a rich data set of patients' say, families' say, and case managers' say. This can give us a full picture of a triangle where there's the family, patients, and professionals."

Tessler wants to create a measurement that people can use to measure the impact of burden on families.

He said, "I try to make practical applications which represent a way for me to make small contributions to those whose lives are being strained."

Tessler came to UMass in 1973 as an assistant professor after his post-doctoral work. In 1982, Tessler published "The Chronically Mentally Ill: Assessing Community Support Programs."

■ fees

Instead, Trustee Eric DiCara drafted what he termed a "statement of principle," asking the chancellors and University President David Knapp to delay the increases in the hope that increased taxes will nullify the need to raise revenue through student fees.

DiCara said his resolution, which was tacked on to the decision to increase fees, also states that the trustees do not intend to raise student fees again this school year, but he added that the resolution is reversible.

Before the Board of Trustees meeting, the trustees' Committee on Budget and Financial Affairs held a special meeting in which they debated the fee increase.

Duffey explained to the committee the serious situation UMass-Amherst is facing vis-a-vis the budget cuts.

"We're downsizing to become a smaller, tighter, less comprehensive university than we were, and a less competitive university," he said.

Duffey said this trend is likely to continue through fiscal year 1992.

Faculty members from the University also addressed the committee.

Massachusetts Society of Professors President John Cole, an anthropology professor at UMass, described the declining morale of faculty members. He said the flight of faculty from the Amherst campus will increase rapidly if the University's quality continues to drop.

"If you don't want us, we'll leave, simple as that," Cole said.

Cole also cited a recent survey, in which 90 percent of non-tenured faculty at the University said they are looking for a job elsewhere. Fifty percent said they have received queries from other universities regarding a transfer from UMass, the study said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE:vR You will be a real mover and shaker. Others respond favorably to your leadership, especially in January. Give self-promotion top priority. Try to make new overseas contacts in March. Romance blossoms along with the flowers in May. June will see you dropping outdated work procedures to cut down on overhead. Fall features an upward swing for your finances. Travel to parts unknown makes November an exciting month. A family reunion you host during the holiday season will help restore domestic tranquillity.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: actor Richard Burton, painter William Hogarth, Reformation leader Martin Luther, actor Roy Schneider.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A friend could act erratically. A message must be clarified. Someone who brings bad news could be misinformed. Refuse to panic. The true situation will be revealed.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Save your energy for important matters. An influential business associate will back your pet project. A newcomer displays interest in your ideas. Try not to dominate group conversations.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Tackle important tasks during early-morning hours. Creative endeavors enjoy favorable influences. Conserve money by letting others pay their fair share. A personal relationship takes on deeper meaning.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Get an early start today to beat out the competition. Gather the materials you will need for important business appointments. You would be wise to spend more time with offspring.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Co-workers turn to you for answers. Avoid making any drastic changes in your routine lest they upset the applecart. Romance may pose a slight problem where your social calendar is concerned.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You continue to move forward at a steady pace, finding delight in variety. Contact a friend about business matters and you will get quick results. Romance can be promising if you face reality.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Greater self-discipline is necessary to complete complex projects. Teamwork shortens your working hours and boosts profits. Playing a new role will bring financial gains. Compromise with your mate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Caution is required to prevent a loss of financial security. Consult tax experts. A close friend may appear overly curious about your personal affairs. Be direct. Catch up on correspondence.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Study research materials before making new proposals. You may have been misinformed. Maintain a low profile around a fault-finding co-worker. Premature disclosure could harm a pet project.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Loved one helps you solve an old mystery. Certain revelations make course of action clear. Consult your mate before issuing or accepting social invitations. Nurture romance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be more aggressive about drumming up new business. A constructive conversation with an associate bolsters your spirits. You develop a new strategy for solving an old problem.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Good luck prevails where business and property matters are concerned. A hunch pays off. Your lively personality will dazzle an attractive new acquaintance. Consolidate recent financial gains.

Thompson is second in scoring behind Tashiro, racking up seven goals and five assists for 19 points. She will be a player that the Reds will have to keep an eye on and Rudy said, "Karla Thompson carved us up last year [in a 3-1 Tiger win in the regular season]. She created a penalty kick and scored one on a header."

Tashiro (12-4-28) will be one player that UMass will have to pay particular attention to. "She's quiet and unassuming," Rudy said. "She'll lure you into a state of complacency, then she'll turn on you and put one in the net."

Besides the stacked forwards, Colorado College coach Dang Publevich has another wrinkle in his offense — interchangeable wing halfbacks and defenders on the flanks, which could present a problem for a UMass back four that has been solid all year.

"That's where strict man-to-man defense can be exploited," Rudy said. "You can't play man-to-man if you're not concentrating."

But Rudy feels that his defense will pull through and plug up the open space in their defending third of the field. "We'll be solid defensively," he said. "It'll be urgent to get a lot of people goalside and pressure their attackers."

The one-week layoff between playoff games has helped UMass heal from its late-season injuries. The Reds will certainly be healthier for Colorado College than they were for Virginia in last week's 2-0 win in the NCAA first round.

"Everyone — cross my fingers — is healthy," Rudy said. That includes the Reds' top four scorers — April Kater (10-9-29), Sue Gaudette (9-10-28), Kim Eynard (8-5-21) and Michele Woodside (6-3-15). All four were bothered by an assortment of foot, groin and knee injuries, but they seem to be healthy.

UMass will once again stick to their season-long, blue-collar work philosophy. It's gotten them through an entire season and Rudy sees no reason for change.

"We know who we are and what we have to do," Rudy said. "And they know how to get it done."

Hopefully, the Reds will come back with a Rocky Mountain high.

After a fine 6-2-1 finish in the dual-meet season and a runnerup finish in the New England Championships, LaFreniere sees the meet as an opportunity to compete against the best.

"I think it will be a great experience for my kids to go up some of the best teams nationally," she said. "This meet will be a dogfight — there are some teams that are clearly ahead of us and a lot of other schools who are right in there with us."

Among the distinguished at the ECACs will be the nation's top-ranked team, Villanova, No. 6 Georgetown, and No. 9 Boston College, Providence and Yale. Some of the schools that the Minutewomen will be aiming for are Dartmouth, Harvard, Vermont, Connecticut and Rhode Island.

"This meet will be a measure of how much New England has improved as a region," LaFreniere said. "If we're healthy and everyone shows up to run, we'll do our best."

men's x-country

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team has a more modest goal, however, one that would place them somewhere between 12th and 15th place.

"I'd like to see us in the third five," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien. "If we run like we did at New England's [fourth place] we should be in the top fifteen."

Realizing that the Minutemen have had a somewhat erratic season, O'Brien feels that his team has grown immensely since September and will hopefully be ready to put a couple of good races in row together.

"We had a couple of bad early meets," O'Brien said. "But we've run two out of three very good championship meets. There's no guarantees of having a great meet of course, but these guys have grown a year older in only three months time. They've grown as fast as any team I've ever coached."

Setting the example for the younger Minutemen have been two seniors, Joe Livorsi and James Chute. The duo will hope to close out solid college careers for UMass this Saturday after impressive finishes at the New Englands two weeks ago.

SPORTS

UM to try to back BU into corner

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Back on Oct. 25, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team bused over to Boston University and tamed the Terriers through 70 minutes of regulation and two overtimes. Still though, nothing was settled as the New England rivals walked away from a scoreless game.

There will be no ties at Nickerson Field tomorrow though when the Minutewomen play BU in the first round of the NCAA tournament (1 p.m.). However long it takes, the game will be decided and the winner will play defending national champion Old Dominion on Sunday (1 p.m.).

The Minutewomen are preparing for a dogfight. But whether they put the Terriers to sleep or not may depend on how well UMass executes on its penalty corners.

"We need to score on our corners," Hixon said. "BU plays a relatively unorthodox corner defense so I think we can capitalize on it by making some changes. It is very difficult while the game is going on to make a lot of changes so I think now we are prepared to work against their corner defense."

There will be no changes in personnel though. The adjustment will be in the play and the formation which UMass employs.

"We just need to take our corner hits from different areas of the field," Hixon said. "And if we're going to make a pass we've got to do it to other areas of the field and a very different set up than there normally would be."

Old Dominion, the No. 1 seed in the 12-team tourney is waiting around the corner for the survivor. But at the present moment until the buzzer sounds on Saturday, Hixon and her team will try not to think about the Lady Monarchs.

"Our kids really have something to prove. They felt like they had opportunities to win the last time and lip service this time just doesn't cut it," Hixon said. Now, we just have to step out there and prove ourselves. I don't think we can possibly look by BU."

BU has a couple of tough forwards in Sally Maxwell (four goals and nine assists) and Tamarah Klein (nine goals and two assists). BU goaltender Lori Heywood has played every minute of every game for the 13-4-1 Terriers.

"Bernie [Martel] has got to have the same kind of game against Sally [Maxwell] that she did the first time," Hixon said. "Bernie has got to match that performance."

Hixon also believes that keeping the ball off the stick of BU's Lisa Brone will be key in shutting down the Terriers once again. "Lisa [Berardinelli] has to play very tough against Lisa [Brone] and not allow her to get the ball," Hixon said. "And I believe after this past weekend, Lisa knows what she has to do. She had to play against Jane Catanzaro and Elenore Stone."

The winner will play a downright scary ODU team the next day at Nickerson (1 p.m.). Sophomore Maikke Hilbrand has scored 44 goals and 13 assists already this year and most of those goals have come of the penalty corner.

Winniford Sanders (three goals and 44 assists) and Carolyn Sarr (four goals and 43 assists) along with goalie Kathy Fosina who has given up just nine goal in 23 game has made the Lady Monarchs just about invincible. Just about.

Back on Oct. 14 in Chapel Hill, N.C., the University of North Carolina handed ODU its only loss of the year and it was a convincing one, 5-2. The Minutewomen may have to catch the Lady Monarchs on the right day if they wish to pull what the Tar Heels did almost a month ago.

"We played exceptionally well on that day and we made the most of our opportunities," UNC coach Karen Shelton said.

When there on, the Lady Monarchs don't appear to have any glaring Achilles heel. "They don't have many weaknesses," Shelton said. "I couldn't really pinpoint a weakness. I think we were fortunate to win."

The Minutewomen hope they will be as fortunate this weekend.

Reds look for big win in Rockies

By RICK SETO

The women's soccer team has proven all year that they can play anywhere, anyplace and anytime, but even the Reds (12-3-4) will be walking into new territory when they meet Colorado College Sunday (1 p.m., WMUA 91.1) in the NCAA quarterfinals.

Set in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, the Colorado Springs campus will make for some great photographs, but all is not as picturesque as it seems. The Tigers' Stewart Field is higher than Denver's Mile High Stadium and the thin air is a potential problem for a team like UMass who hasn't played under such conditions.

However, head coach Jim Rudy downplays any worries about his team adapting to the light stuff.

"I feel that we'll play despite the altitude," Rudy said. "But the question is whether we can come out in the second half and sustain our work rate when we usually grab our part of the game.

"I think we'll have to breathe harder, but I think our players are athletic enough and psychologically strong enough to cope with [the altitude]."

The Reds will also have to be ready to deal with the Tigers, which won't be a light task by any means. Colorado College enters the game as the nation's second-ranked team in the final ISAA poll and a 14-3 record, including an 8-1 home mark at Stewart.

"They have a style of play that could give us some problems," Rudy said. "They play a two-man front with one forward and one back [instead of side-to-side], leaving them with a lot of room for them to run."

The forward that is usually up is sophomore Karla Thompson and the one stacked behind her is senior Kerri Tashiro. "They're both big, strong girls who work well together," Rudy said.

Hoop looks to stir Rage in the Cage

By GEORGE AUSTIN

Try to pronounce this one: Sodertajle. That's the name of the Swedish basketball team that the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will play tomorrow (7 p.m., Curry Hicks Cage) in an exhibition game.

And 18 days before the season is about to start, UMass coach John Calipari has already assembled a tentative top-eight. "I'm pretty well set on the top-eight [players] right now," Calipari said. "All that can happen is one of those guys can move out of the top-eight but I doubt if that will happen."

It is a young lineup. Freshmen Tony Barbee, a 6-foot-6 forward from Indianapolis, and Harper Williams, a 6-foot-7 forward from Bridgeport, Conn., have earned starting jobs to this point. Freshman forward Tom Pace from Denver has also worked himself into coach Cal's top eight slots. "They've earned their spots already which is unfortunate for some of the upperclassmen but that's the way it goes," Calipari said.

The sophomore guard tandem of Jim McCoy and pointman Anton Brown will remain intact in the backcourt, though Brown's comeback will be delayed because of a knee injury. John Tate (forward) and Rafer Giles (guard) also will fill some prime minutes along with the veteran of the group, senior Carey Herer.

Nobody will be sitting on the pine for the duration of the game however. "In the second half, I'm going to try to get everybody in and I'm not really worried about winning the game," Calipari said.

Women's hoop note: The UMass women's basketball team will play Amager of Denmark tomorrow (5 p.m. at the Cage).

Minutemen look to spoil Villanova

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

With its postseason chances spoiled a few weeks ago, the UMass football team will try to spoil the opportunity for a couple of other teams as the curtain comes down on the 1989 season.

Tomorrow, the Minutemen (4-4-1) will battle Villanova University, one of five teams in the Yankee Conference that is entertaining hopes of winning the YanCon title or a berth in the NCAA Division I playoffs. Game time is 1:30 p.m. at Villanova Stadium in Villanova, Penn.

UMass has been a banged and bruised unit for the past couple of weeks, and will be looking now to get through the final two weeks of the year without any other major calamities.

"We've got to work toward the positive things for next year," said UMass coach Jim Reid.

So without the strongest of squads to take the field, the Minutemen would have to be considered an underdog to knock off 'Nova, which has withstood some severe tests to remain one of the top dogs in the Conference.

The Wildcats (4-2 in the Conference, 6-3 overall) could have put themselves in the driver's seat with a win over New Hampshire after learning that Maine had lost to Boston University.

But getting only four field goals form kicker Tom Withka, the 'Cats openly saw the kicking game kill them as UNH got a field goal on the last play of the game to pull it out, 13-12.

Thus, Villanova fell out of any contention of winning the Yankee Conference. They can still tie for the title, but has no shot of the automatic bid.

Villanova coach Andy Talley isn't looking at it in that way. For a school that five years ago didn't have a team, a slice of the championship pie — even without any cherries or whipped cream, will hit the spot.

Harriers in final stretch of season

The ECAC Championships at Waveny Park in New Canaan, CT on Saturday will provide the Minutewomen the 'privilege' of lining up against some of the finest harriers in the nation.

The format of the ECACs has been changed this year to separate the haves from the have-nots. The race will be split up into two sections; a national qualifying race and a 'University Divisions' for teams not as competitive.

"Having come in second in New England, we definitely belong in the national qualifying race," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

The IC4A Cross Country Championships, to be held this Saturday at Wavenly Park in New Cannan, CT, is easily the most talent-filled race in the country, second only to the NCAA Championships.

Out of the 65 teams competing, eight have been ranked among the nations top 20 Division I programs during the year at one time or another.

At stake for these eight teams as well as a handful of others is a possible trip to the National Championship. The top two New England teams which make up Region I will advance to the NCAAs.

UNIVERSITY ON STRIKE!!!

• Union leads move to walk

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Various leaders of the Union of Undergraduates addressed more than 1,000 potential strikers reiterating the importance of the strike to save the future of public higher education.

"Public education is being threatened, we are terribly underfunded," Lisa Nelson, chairperson of the Public Policy Committee of the Student Senate said. "The corporations and individuals who could be paying the most taxes are not. We are doing this for everyone."

Students gathered in the Student Union Ballroom after they were contacted by union members through phone calls, word-of-mouth, campus-wide canvassing, and dorm-targeting.

"Strike, strike, strike," reverberated through the SUB while students waited for the meeting to commence.

The state recently hiked student fees some $350 effective next semester and proposed increasing out-of-state tuition $3,000. Already, more than $25 million has been slashed from the UMass coffers in the past three years.

The Union of Undergraduates represents all undergraduate students. They presented their proposal to strike to the Student Senate, which passed in a 66-11 vote. The Executive Committee of the Faculty Union endorsed the strike Friday.

Several hundred students walked out of classes at noon Friday, kicking off a day of "personal action" to prepare for today's strike.

More than 1,000 students gathered around the Student Union steps after the walkout and chanted, "Strike, strike, strike! Education is a right!"

Jeremy Levinson, member of the undergraduate union said, "We've shown our political leaders that we cared - we've called, we wrote, we went to Boston. We're done asking."

"We're going to shut down this University and demand equality in Public Education in Massachusetts," Levinson said.

Angus McQuilkan, senator from the commuter area said, "To the people who say, 'They're just blowing off classes,' they should run for public office because it's just the kind of ignorance that would fit in on Beacon Hill."

• Faculty gives mixed reactions

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The two faculty organizations at the University of Massachusetts are at odds over whether to support the student strike against continued budget cuts to public higher education.

John Cole, the president of the Faculty Union which is composed of 1,050 of the 1,300 faculty members at UMass, announced Friday at a rally that the Executive Committee of the union voted to endorse the student strike.

The statement issued by the Executive Committee requested that faculty not penalize students who are participating in the strike, excuse abscences and postpone assignments and tests.

Other committee recommendations to faculty are:

- To devote class sessions to lectures and activities connected with the strike and its concerns.
- To participate in teach-ins and forums.
- To hold classes at alternative sites.
- To honor picket lines.
- To contact alumni and parents
- To join students in lobbying legislators through phone banks, postcards or personal visits to the Statehouse.

He said budget cuts will force teaching assistant layoffs, increased class sizes and decreased faculty support staffs.

"It is illegal for state employees to go on strike," he said. "The best thing to do is to support the strike by not penalizing the people who engage in it."

The Executive Committee will ask the Union Executive Board Wednesday to support the strike.

Frank Hugus, a member of the Faculty Senate Rules Committee, said the Rules Committee voted 7-0 Friday not to support the student strike. The committee members said a student strike had the potential to disrupt the campus and they could not foresee any positive results from a strike, Hugus said.

"The action is directed at the campus itself," he said. "And the fault lies not with us on campus, but in Boston."

The Faculty Senate oversees a majority of the faculty's academic concerns, and the union is responsible for contractual issues.

"Faculty members can make up their own minds," Hugus said. "And I am sure

Pro-choicers fill capital for rally

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — Some 300,000 women, men and children from all over the country gathered in front of the Lincoln Memorial Sunday to rally for women's rights to abortion.

Ralliers, toting placards reading, "Abortion on demand without apology," "Catholics for choice," and "Not every ejaculation deserves a name," cheered and sang for over three hours, listening to more than 30 speakers.

Molly Yard, president of the National Organization for Women, echoed the words of Martin Luther King saying, "For every woman and every girl of reproductive age, let freedom ring, so she can control her reproductive life."

Declaring that the right to birth control and abortion are fundamental constitutional rights, Yard urged women to mobilize and vote for pro-choice candidates.

"Bush is enslaving the women of this country," Yard said. "Tell him that we will never go back."

Ellie Smeal, president of the Fund for the Feminist Agenda, said abortion has become the most important political issue.

"On Nov. 7, abortion was the major issue in the election of the first Black governor in Virginia," Smeal said. "In New York and New Jersey, pro-choice voters have had their say."

Smeal advocated for the feminism of power in political leadership as she lead the crowd chanting, "George says no choice, we say no George."

President Bush recently vetoed legislation granting federal funding for abortions for women who are victims of rape and incest.

Four members of Operation Rescue, an anti-abortion organization, silently stood among a crowd of pro-choice women.

Joseph Foreman, acting-director of Operation Rescue said, "Yard said that she is waiting for the time when all life is sacred . . . why aren't the lives of children sacred?"

Patrick Mahoney, another Operation Rescue member said, "This abortion debate will be settled by the grass roots voters. America is deeply divided on this issues, but the pro-life side will win."

David Dinkins, the mayor-elect of New York City whose pro-life stand was part of his platform during his candidacy, made a surprise appearance at the rally.

KEEP ABORTION LEGAL

More than 300,000 people rally in Washington D.C. yesterday for women's rights to safe, legal abortions.

"In the elections in Virginia, New Jersey and New York City, the people spoke, and the people were heard. The people said 'We believe in choice and we will never be denied,'" he said to the enthusiastic crowd.

Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Lt. Gov. Evelyn Murphy said the abortion fight is one of constitutional liberties, similar to the Civil Rights Movement.

"Why are we here at the footsteps of Martin Luther King? We are here as they were here, to fight for the cause of freedom, " she said.

"This is no longer a partisan issue," she said, "We will continue to fight and we will win."

Two monuments erected

Memorialize pro-choice, life stances

WASHINGTON — Just as the the Vietnam Veterans' memorial stands in the memory of thousands of deaths in a bloody conflict, two new memorials were erected, mourning a completely different war.

On the eve of the Mobilization for Women's Rights, two monuments representing opposite sides of the abortion debate faced each other, fighting a silent battle in yet another chapter of women's struggle for safe and legal abortions.

One monument, standing in front of the Washington Monument, was built by members of the National Organization for Women in memory of the courageous women who died from illegal and unsafe abortions.

The purple and white floral display stood before the 10-foot wooden structure painted to resemble marble, dedicated to the 200,000 women worldwide who died from illegal or self-induced abortions.

Across Constitution Ave. in front of the White House, a mock "Cemetery of the Innocents" represented the unspoken testimony of the unborn who have died in abortion chambers since 1973.

The American Coalition for Life said the 4,400 unmarked graves were a "plea" to outlaw abortion.

Signs stated the cemetery was not a protest against the rally.

However, the pro-choice monument was protected by two security guards and other N.O.W. supporters on Saturday night, said Jonathan Robbins, a member of N.O.W..

Both groups obtained permits from the National Park Service to display these memorials, but were restricted from vandalizing the opposing monument, Robbins said.

Good showing in D.C. from 5-college area

WASHINGTON — Thousands of Massachusetts students and residents participated in the massive Mobilization for Women's Rights rally at the Lincoln Memorial yesterday.

Nine buses transported more than 400 students from the five college area, including members of the Progressive Organization for Women's Rights, People for Choice, and other pro-choice advocates.

However, many other abortion rights supporters were unable to make the trip, according to Carla Halpern, co-president of POWER.

"Buses were sold out across the state," Halpern said, "Many people had to be turned away."

Yet, the students who did attend the rally said they were pleased with the turnout. Rally organizers said as many as 300,000 people attended the demonstration.

Many students said they thought the rally's impact would be felt mostly at the state level. Their sentiments were expressed on bumper stickers that read "I'm pro-choice, and I vote."

The Supreme Court ruled this summer in the Webster case that states have the right to determine if abortion should be legal within its borders.

"Everyone here is pro-choice," said Alisa Dommer, a UMass student. "People can do something if they vote."

"There should not be any laws by men to prevent a woman's right to choose," said Mario Pete Villejo, of Northampton. "This rally will definitely have an effect, but it's not the last thing that should be done." he said.

Singers Pete Seeger and Helen Reddy, and a host of political, medical and organizational speakers also rallied for women's rights, stressing individual voting power.

"Its always exciting to see so many different people unifying and strategizing," said Marci Lew, co-founder of People for Choice.

O'Leary Amendment could bail out TAs

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

An amendment calling for a 20 percent reduction in the state's '03' accounts, payroll funds for thousands of University employees, was brought before state legislators late Thursday and will continue to be debated today.

"This account [03] deals with graduate students, research assistants, student hourly, and non-student, non-faculty part-time employees, and outside consultants," said Budget Director Joyce Hatch. "They're being cut not by the propsed 10 percent but by 20 percent."

The O'Leary Amendment will alter the wording in the bill, which is scheduled to be debated today by the House Ways and Means Committee, by removing graduate students and student employees from the category of '03.'

"If the wording remains the same in this amendment, 30 days after the bill is passed the termination of all '03' contracts will occur," she said.

According to Hatch, after the contracts are terminated, there will be a review of all contracts and a 90 percent reinstatement of those dissolved.

"It will not affect all graduate students, rather it will hit TAs the hardest," Hatch said Sunday.

Mark Kenen, graduate student and member of the Leadership Coalition said, "This a devastating blow to the University community, especially for undergraduate education."

Cynthia Kaufman said, a graduate student and STPEC TA said, "We've mobilized really hard so far against these cuts, we will now be working even harder to get ourselves out of this mess as soon as possible."

"People aren't going to work without a contract. Hopefully we can cause a lot of disruption that shows we are concerned," she said.

The Graduate Employee Organization has endorsed the undergraduate student strike and is encouraging TAs to devote class sections to teach-ins and forums on the strike, honor picket lines, join students in their lobbying efforts and contact alumni and parents.

"We have an overwhelming majority of graduate students that are in support of the strike," Kaufman said. "We are encouraging them to support the strike by not penalizing students for missed classes."

Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, said, "A strike which contains the elements of teach-ins and constructive political action is very productive in moving forward our agenda."

"The postcards were well received," he said. "The students should keep on calling and writing their legislators, it is really affecting them."

"By the end of the week we'll know whether we've been successful in getting this amendment through," said Rosenberg.

Cyclists ride to Boston to meet reps.

Six members of the University of Massachusetts Cycling team plan to travel to the Statehouse today to meet with legislators to express their opposition to the repeated cuts to higher education. However, it is not a conventional trip. They will be traveling on two wheels.

Although Dan Mahan and Doug Weirauch, two University of Massachusetts students who attempted to walk to Boston this weekend, did not make it by foot, Greg Swinand, president of the UMass Cycling team said he has not changed his plans.

Swinand and five other team members plan to bicycle to Boston via route 9 to meet with state legislators. The group planned to leave from the Student Union today at 9 a.m. and hopes to arrive at the State House by 3:30 p.m., Swinand said.

Richard Rogers, associate professor of agricultural and resource economics and two other members of his department volunteered to sponsor the cylcists, out of their own pockets, for each mile of the 110-mile trek.

Rogers said the money raised will be put in a fund to help reduce the impact of any fee increases, he said.

Education is not the only program suffering from budget

Registration in CC

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts residents who are not registered to vote will have a chance to register tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday on the Campus Center Concourse.

Michael Donovan, a non-traditional undergraduate who helped organize the registration drive, said about 15,000 students protested against budget cuts to public higher education at the Statehouse on Oct. 18.

However, many state legislators believe only a small percentage of students are registered to vote in Massachusetts.

■ voter registration

"Rallies are great to get instant attention," he said. "But they don't carry any political power if the people who are rallying are not voters. The only way we are going to have any real political power, and influence the system, is to register and vote."

Susan Laing, a graduate student and registration drive organizer, encouraged students to register to vote in their hometown. She said students should contact their legislators and tell them education is an important issue in their legislative voting districts.

"Legislators from towns where there are no colleges have an impression that education is not a big issue, so they vote in favor of education cuts," she said. "Students live in every town, but if the legislators don't hear from the students they are not forced to be concerned about higher education."

Five non-traditional students, O'Neil Hardy, 27; Angelika Schwolow, 36; Lisa O'Brien, 25; Donovan, 25; and Laing, 33; organized the drive.

Non-traditional students have either postponed their undergraduate education after high school or have taken time off from college.

The idea for a student voter registration drive originated during a discussion after the Oct. 18 rally. The students talked about ways college students can influence their legislators, and how, if large blocks of students were registered to vote, their lobbying power would increase dramatically.

Two weeks ago, the Amherst Board of Registrars agreed to hold voter registration this week, Laing said.

Schwolow said some students do not realize how much power a vote has. The five organizers, while out of school, lived in small communities and experienced how the political process works, she said.

Donovan said non-voting students cannot expect their representatives to respond to their concerns.

"The bottom line is, students who don't vote have no voice and are unrepresented," he said.

Registration is open to all Massachusetts residents. Students who were registered last semester, but who have moved — even to another room in the same building — must re-register, Laing said.

Strike only if you believe

Where are you reading this right now? In a picket line outside of an academic building? At a teach-in? In a class?

Perhaps you are alone, or in a crowd of noisy protestors. Highly unlikely, but maybe you're a lonely protestor.

Wherever you are, hopefully you got there via your own decision. That is, you don't feel bad that you're sitting by yourself in lecture, or that you're packed in with other protesting sardines (if you are, try not to wrinkle the paper. It will continue to be your source of information).

Alise Harfield

I suppose I've taken it for granted that the majority of students, whether readers of this first-day-of-the-strike paper or not, will be indeed striking.

Actually, I'm just reporting on what I've heard thus far — that the idea of striking until the students and faculty on this campus are heard by those in charge of our budget is a terrific idea, that the faculty supports students who won't be in classes for an indefinite number of days (perhaps until the end of the semester, if then), and that well, it worked for CUNY.

I'm not sure I can so easily accept what I've heard.

Having the option to protest what we disagree with is something not only worth using (even using daily) but savoring. We at UMass are truly fortunate to be outspoken, should we choose to. Putting aside what you may think of the government stifling rights here and there — on this campus we can and do speak out whenever we want. Recalling what occured in China to those our age ought make one appreciate this opportunity.

Can we make ourselves heard any louder than they could?

What seems truly unfortunate to me is the answer I reach when I ask, how many of the rallies, protests, sit-ins, takeovers, etc. seen on this campus really reach the end to their means and change the way those who aren't running them think — make us more open-minded? Be realistic. How many positively affect you for more than five minutes after entering the Student Union to meet friends at the Hatch for lunch?

Don't know? How about asking yourself? (No one's listening but you, so you can be honest.) Do they change the way you perceive those in your classes that are different (religion, nationality, sex, sexual preference, color) than you? If yes, do you ever wonder why they are then still necessary?

Has too much practice at protest made UMass over perfect? Does anyone pay attention to us anymore? If you had the least bit of doubt as to the good of our protests and you're on campus reading this newspaper, how will those in Boston think?

Will the strike be misconstrued as ZooMass at it again?

It doesn't have to be. Here is a cause the school can band together for — uniting us as a student body, not separating us into speakers and compulsive Hatch rats. If and only if we believe in the cause, we can all be the speakers.

Whatever you decide to do today and the weeks that follow, I hope that we stay within the cause we are supporting. That is, strike because you want to — not because your friend is. The difference this strike can make for you that other protests may not have can be found in yourself. If you believe in this cause, fight for it. Maybe it will affect everybody.

What kind of art is this, anyway?

I would like to know who is in charge of deciding what is displayed in the Hampden Art Gallery of Southwest.

Why? It seems that someone made a mistake and allowed a so called "artist" to display their work. This "art," or whatever it is, is in my eyes quite offensive and vulgar. For the readers who don't venture into Southwest often, I will enlighten you.

The gallery wall is covered by small sailboats that have a phallic symbol crossing through their sails — that is only the backdrop. Some of the main art work includes the framed "Nine Inch Penis," a quilt like banner, and a whole slew of other revolting pictures and statements. Someone remove it.

Exhibit victimized by ignorance

Since the November 2 opening of the Hampden Gallery's current exhibit which features the work of Cary Leibowitz, the gallery has been the site of two incidents of vandalism and several tense confrontations between gallery staff and angry visitors. Each of these reactions by visitors seems to have been sparked by Leibowitz's straightforward treatment of his homosexuality.

In light of these disturbing incidents the gallery staff wishes to clarify its support of the Leibowitz exhibit and to address certain questions which have come up since last week's opening.

While we are saddened by the acts of vandalism with which certain individuals have responded to the exhibit, we are distressed by the thought — explicit in the comments of some visitors, and implicit in the vandals' acts — that the exhibit comprises a malevolent gesture toward the community.

We believe that the exhibit itself provides the most eloquent testimony to the contrary, and it is this reason that we have not supplemented the exhibit with a curatorial "explanation."

Our faith in the exhibit includes a faith in the accessibility of its many rewards, and has been supported by the enthusiastic responses of many visitors who have taken time to see it in its entirety.

The image of this exhibit as something we are foisting upon our audience is troublesome because we take our mandate as a publicly funded educational program very seriously.

We feel that this is precisely the sort of exhibit which makes public funding of the arts worthwhile — an exhibit which fulfills the oft broken promise of truly educational content.

We know that the majority of our visitors are more interested in learning than in lashing out at the unknown, and we hope that you will visit us in the near future.

Spreading the plea for peace for Nicaraguans

. . . "Reading the news and it sure looks bad. They won't give peace a chance. That was just a dream some of us had." . . . Joni Mitchell

The headlines of the last few days, concerning Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega's decision to suspend the cease-fire with the U.S. backed contra rebels, bring anger to my chest and tears to my eyes. I'm sunk in the crunch of studying, trying to keep up with mid-term exams and assignment deadlines, yet I'm too distracted to study.

I don't really feel I can afford to take the time to respond to the tragedy unfolding in a distant part of the world, but how can we not! The lives affected by this violent reality touch me now, and shake me out of my cave of theoretical analysis. Those faces I can still picture, and they compel me to take some kind of action.

The New York Times has reported that U.S. Policy makers are united in their anger against Ortega. Well, I'm angry too.

I'm angry at the press for their distorted coverage, using the media as a tool to imprint a negative image on the public mind.

I'm angry at our representatives, who seem to think of this war as a political game, played out between ideologies, labels and images, not as death and an ongoing struggle for survival.

And I'm angry at our "kind and gentle" President George Bush, who attacked Ortega personally, with racial slurs, calling him a "little man" and "an animal at a garden party." Bush also seems bent on destroying the Sandinista government of Nicaragua and the whole population in the process.

But more than this, I'm upset by the unspoken implications in all these harsh words and of where this propaganda campaign might be leading.

Judy Lieberman

In Washington, liberals and conservatives are annoyed because the action taken by Ortega, in response to escalating contra activity, forces them to confront an issue they thought they had put behind them.

Nicaraguans had hoped as well that the war, was at last behind them. It has brought so much pain into so many lives and crippled the promise of their revolution. Forty thousand people have died in the last eight years, many of them peasants.

But they have no choice but to face its continued presence in their lives, whether it becomes news here or not.

How twisted to blame the victim of terror when the truth lies in front of our faces, written between the lines, for any who want to know it.

The fact is that it is the Bush administration stands in the way of peace by continuing to fund the Contras in direct violation of the Tela accords. As attested to by international observers, Nicaragua has lived up to its side of the bargain, and President Ortega, in a letter to the New York Times, reaffirmed his promise.

Meanwhile, "alleged" contra attacks have continued to target agricultural cooperatives, Sandinista supporters, and in the last month, the electoral registration process.

I can attest to the reality of these attacks.

Living for four months on a dairy and basic grain cooperative in a rural community near Boaco in the mountains of central Nicaragua last spring, I felt the fear of that possibility when a nearby coop was attacked in May.

The people of Nicaragua see the unfolding events in a unique light. President Bush should only hope for one tenth of the man and leader that Daniel Ortega is in the eyes of his people, who see him as a fighter for their cause.

It was my privilege to know campessino life, seen by so few outside of it. It allowed me to begin to see things with different eyes.

Now it is my responsibility to share that knowledge and spread the plea for peace.

Don't let our politicians destroy the chance.

Judy Lieberman is a UMass student

Schedule of events for strikers:

A message to all students from the Union of Undergraduates

By now, everyone is aware of the imminent strike bestowed upon the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The following information has been compiled to further inform all concerned persons of the events and aspects of the strike surrounding the upcoming days of unity amongst students, professors, labor workers and administrators in our struggle for a quality, affordable education.

First and foremost, to commence the activities planned for today, picket lines located in various areas across campus are organized to help save education in Massachusetts. We believe that education is a right and not a privilege. The picket lines are necessary to express solidarity among all students. Our goal is to unite students in order to protect Massachusetts investment in its economic future. We encourage all students to join in an effort that has been supported by a multitude of professors and graduate students. Students should be encouraged in a non-threatening manner to join the picket line. The style should be friendly conversation.

Classified and professional staff, office workers, custodians, etc. must be allowed through the line with no opposition. We can offer those in support a white armband to express solidarity. Faculty should be encouraged to honor the picket line and not enter their classes. Each picket line will have a picket captain wearing a red armband. Follow the instructions of the captain. They have been briefed on handling the media, and are in communication with strike headquarters.

A conglomeration of events have been and are in the process of being planned for the duration of the strike. Please remember that the following list is subject to change if need be, and we recommend consulting the Commuter Area Government Office, the Student Union Ballroom (which will be strike headquarters throughout the strike), the Strike Information Board (located across from the Hatch), and the Campus Center Information Desk for planned events.

The Student Union Ballroom, acting as strike headquarters, will have all information regarding picketing, updates of student action on the 29 other campuses throughout Massachusetts, and informed strike coordinators to answer any questions you may have. This room will also serve as one of the many "strike havens" featuring such events as a lecture by Grad. Student Marc Kenen, Prof. Bruce Laurie and Dr. John Cole, speaking on the Hidden Agenda behind the budget crisis, the class divisions responsible for the budget crisis and the politics of the budget crisis, respectively.

Teach-Ins and lectures will offered by Prof. Albey Reiner (microbiology), Prof. Harvey Friedman (history), Prof. Sut Jhally (communications), Prof. Fresia Bradford (Spanish/Portugese), Prof. Elizabeth Petroff (comp. lit.) on student empowerment, Prof. Gordon McClelland (labor studies), Tom Coish (Legal Services Offices) and Prof. Sandra Morgan speaking on "Strikes — Past and Present."

The aforementioned are only the beginning, with programs and activities sponsored by MassPIRG, the Animal Rights Coalition, Hillel, the Student Government Association, Orchard Hill Area Government, and the Southwest Area Government. Lobbying workshops will be available tomorrow for those who wish to participate in our Wednesday-Friday lobby trips to Boston. Phone Banking will commence today and last through the duration of the strike at the Newman Center, and music will be provided by "Jester." On Thursday at the Arnold House Tower, the Communication Disorders Club will offer striking students free coffee at 8 a.m., and then half-price foods thereafter.

For those students interested in study marathons, please be aware that the Hatch (back room) will be open daily from 2:30-4:30 for students boycotting classes, and also the Music/Reading Room, Cape Cod Lounge, The Bluewall, the Campus Center Basement, and of course, weather permitting, the Campus Pond, so that all boycotting students can be centralized, a symbol of our solidarity.

We would like to take this opportunity to express our gratitude to all persons who have been instrumental in our struggle to attain a quality, affordable education. We believe that with unification, cooperation and understanding we can overcome the crisis that thas been thrust upon us. Remember that this crisis affects everyone, regardless of your major, year of graduation, political affiliation or economic status. Every person, regardless of their race, sex, creed, social class, or sexual preference deserves the education this university once promised to them.

cuts, but the environment is also in a crisis, Rogers said.

"The ride will call attention to both of these problems and we thought it was something we could support," Rogers said.

Swinand said at Friday's impromptu rally, he saw potential for students to be lazy during the strike. He also was inspired by walkers Mahan and Weirauch.

"If these guys can walk to Boston, [I thought to myself] we can ride," he said.

Mahan and Weirauch decided to walk to Boston as a last resort and wanted to show legislators they really do care about their education, Mahan said.

The pair quit after 50 miles because they were exhausted, Mahan said.

■ strike

The strike is scheduled to last until the state meets the students demands for a progressive tax package, no further cuts to public higher education, no increased fees or tuition and no more layoffs, according to strike organizers.

"The strike will last until we have been given a progressive tax package," said Nelson.

Progressive taxes are levied based on a person's income and ability to pay.

According to Joyce Hatch, University budget director, the decision regarding a tax package may be made within the week or the month.

Organizational meetings over the weekend established committees, heads of the committees and discussed what type of activities would replace class time left open to striking students.

Organizers said there will be picket lines outside buildings where large numbers of students meet for classes. They said picketers will be friendly and urge students who opt to attend class to join the strike.

each individual will do the right thing."

Fresia Bradford, an assistant Spanish and Portugese professor, said she will conduct her class sections outside Herter Hall.

John Ritter, a professor in the department of mechanical engineering, does not believe the student strike is an effective way to influence legislators, and will conduct classes as scheduled and hold striking students responsible for the missed material.

"I think the students are way off base," he said. "I don't think it [the strike] has a chance because it puts no pressure on senators or representsatives."

3 smart ways to help pay for college.

Here's how the Army Reserve Alternate Training Program can help you pay for college.

THE MONTGOMERY GI BILL

If qualified, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $5,040 for current college expenses.

STUDENT LOAN REPAYMENT

If you obtain a qualifying student loan, you can get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater — up to a maximum of $10,000. Selecting certain specialty training can increase the maximum to $20,000.

PART-TIME INCOME

And here's how you can make even more part-time money while in college. Take Basic Training one summer. The next summer, complete skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,250 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll train with your Army Reserve unit near college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll earn over $85 a weekend to start.

This could be the smartest way to get the money you need for college.

ARTS & LIVING

A Jordan who's superior to Michael

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Stanley Jordan
Friday, Nov. 10

It's almost too bad that Stanley Jordan is perhaps the most technically accomplished guitarist alive. Because it is very difficult not to write about his incredible performance at the Iron Horse without drawing undue attention to his technical feats and slighting the fact that, beyond all the flash, technology and speed, Stanley Jordan is simply a great musician.

For example, I have to mention his original, self-taught technique of "tapping" both hands on the fretboard instead of picking or strumming — a technique that allows him to sound like a three or four-piece band (including an implied rhythm section). I also need to talk about his profound knowledge of harmony, which enables him to produce a very rich, warm sound, when playing his own tunes and when embellishing the hell out of standards.

I couldn't neglect the part of the concert when he played two guitars at once — a standard electric guitar around his neck, and a MIDI guitar synthesizer held up on a stand. On one tune, he got the MIDI guitar to sound like a Hammond organ and played a "guitar-organ duet:" at first, a bluesy thing that sounded like a 60s Harlem jazz organ trio, then a classical-style bit that reminded me of Steve Howe and Rick Wakeman in early-70s Yes.

Finally, I can't go without mentioning his ability to play incredibly complex, fast patterns in a manner suggestive of minimalist composer Steve Reich. All of these details are easy enough to write about, but they are superficial. Far more important, though harder to describe, is Stanley Jordan's musicality. He understands that techniques, technology and styles are just tools for making music. His unique expressiveness seems to be independent of the instrument or the style of the tune he is playing at any given moment. He is warm, soulful, and at times humorous and dramatic. And, yes, he can play the blues.

His material covered jazz standards ("Willow Weep For Me," "A Child Is Born"), pop tunes (the Beatles' "Eleanor Rigby" and Michael Jackson's "The Lady in My Life"), and improvisational flights that resisted easy categorization. But most of all, he played Stanley Jordan. How he did that is just not very important.

Patch holds Kayla's hand (ooh!) on Days

By BETH STOLLER
Collegian Correspondent

DAYS OF OUR LIVES — Santos was about to kill Emilio with a knife when Jack threw tear gas. After Santos ran off, Emilio and Jenn kissed while Jack watched. Patch snuck in on Kayla's sonogram. The lights went off, and Kayla asked Marcus to hold her hand. Patch grabbed it instead. Kimberly walked in on a sweaty Cal. They were about to kiss when someone knocked on the door. Shane and Rebecca broke into a cabin in the woods. Rebecca told Shane to hit the road even though she really doesn't want him to leave. Shane leaves. Outside, he sees a newspaper and finds out. . Irwin is dead!

GENERAL HOSPITAL — Decker admitted everything. Lucy and Alan constantly did the deed. Julian wormed his way back into Sean and Anna's life. Duke is on a remote island off the coast of Brazil requesting to have reconstructive surgery to change his identity. Felicia and Frisco made up and hopped into the sack. After seeing Jimmy get on a boat to Windermere, Felicia goes to police headquarters to tell Frisco. Frisco tells her to stay off the case. Robert and Kate were having a romantic evening at Robert's house when Felicia called from Windermere and said Frisco is following Jimmy and they need help.

Fear and loathing infests the Valley

As far as I can tell, it's a toss up. There are two products of American culture that are strictly ours — McDonald's and Dr. Hunter S. Thompson. Both reflect our society of instant gratification better than anything or anyone else that I can think of. Hunter S. Thompson is far more interesting than McDonald's however, and he will be appearing at the Iron Horse in Northampton for two shows tomorrow, at 7 p.m. and 10 p.m. To some, Thompson is regarded as a bestselling author, he has written insightful political commentary (Fear and Loathing on the Campaign Trail), and has documented societal weirdness in Hell's Angels and the all-time classic, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas.

PREVIEW

To others, he is a sick, demented old man (just ask Ed Meese or William F. Buckley), but to still others (including myself), Hunter S. Thompson is an icon. He has a style all his own, and it is impossible to categorize someone who has created his own genre.

People try to emulate his psychokinetic energies, but no one can do it with such a flair for outrageous morality or conviction. The myth may outweigh the man, but the man has a ton of rage to vent, which should make for an evening of insanity in Noho.

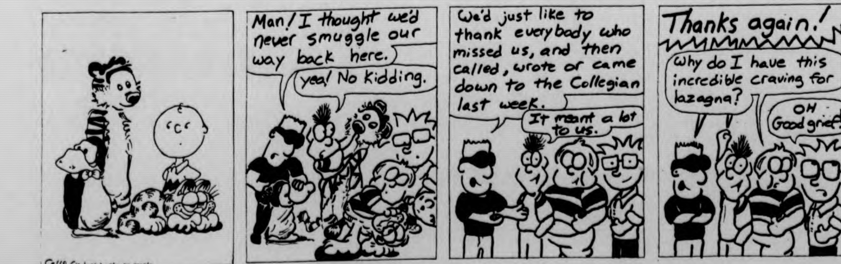
By CELLI



Man! I thought we'd never smuggle our way back here.
yea! No kidding.
We'd just like to thank everybody who missed us, and then called, wrote or came down to the Collegian last week.
It meant a lot to us.
Thanks again!
Why do I have this incredible craving for lazagna?
OH Good grief!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You become more decisive and waste less time. Clear you desk and complete old projects. Aim for financial security and new professional prestige. A surprise rocks your romance boat!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A current challenge may involve a child, your credit or joint finances. A daily walk or exercise session will relieve tension. You cannot afford to be moody at work. Put on a smile.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your mate or closest chum offers good long-range advice or support. An age difference works to your advantage. Rapid career progress will boost your social status for a long time to come.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Sharing ideas can open important doors. Hiring new employees or signing on with a new team is a sound plan. Be helpful but avoid getting caught up in your friend's problems.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your powers of persuasion are at a peak now. You should be able to get almost everything you want! Travel proves advantageous as direct contact is the best way to finalize business deal.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): An aggressive individual could create tension at the office. Be good to yourself if you feel near the breaking point. More rest and better eating habits will bring about a noticeable improvement.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Contact influenctial people who have been elusive. You are ready to make sound decisions regarding your finances. Finish pending business projects before launching new ones. Romance is sweet.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A meeting or lecture you attend today will give you wonderful insights. A social function could put you in touch with an intriguing stranger. You feel an immediate attraction. Watch your step!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Taking risks is essential but losses can be minimized if you do your homework diligently. Set some limits on a relationship. Stop letting someone take you for granted.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You may have to confront an authority figure but the outcome will be worth it. Improving domestic conditions may seem impossible. Ask probing questions and you find what you need.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Friends could let you down; have an alternative in mind. Show more courage; your children will remember your actions far longer than your words. Look forward to a romantic evening.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Although others may be at fault, assigning blame will be unproductive. Gifts to a current love could work a small miracle. A complicated relationship needs to be simplified.

Freshman harriers making great strides

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Adjusting to the pressures of college life is difficult, as many members of the class of 1993 will attest.

To handle the academic rigors of college and to excel in collegiate-level athletic competition is even harder. However, the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team has had two freshmen, Maureen Meldrim and Becky Johnson, who have been able to do this.

Meldrim and Johnson have been important cogs in helping the Minutewomen to an impressive 6-2-1 record and a second-place finish in the New England Championships.

"Both of them are great competitors who hate to lose," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "They're very intelligent kids with good heads on their shoulders — they'll both continue to improve."

Meldrim, from Glenmont, NY, and Johnson, from East Greenbush, NY, came to UMass with stellar high school backgrounds. Meldrim ran varsity track and cross country for five years, finishing in the top 10 for her state meet three times. She competed in gymnastics during seventh grade, but after that Meldrim says, "My track coach told me to go out and run cross country instead."

Johnson, who ran track all four years of high school and cross country for three, didn't show immediate potential as a runner.

"When I went out for track in seventh grade, the coach didn't have me running," Johnson said. "They had me throwing the shot put when I weighed 90 pounds."

Johnson came a long way from her seventh-grade shot putting days, finishing in the top three for her state class meet three times in high school. She points to her fourth-place finish in New York's competitive Federation Meet as her biggest highlight.

"My boyfriend gave me three roses to come in third, which is a lot higher than we expected I would finish," Johnson said. "I came in fourth, which was a great surprise for both of us."

If anything, Meldrim and Johnson suffered from a lack of competition in high school. "In high school you could go to the meets and just jog and still win," Meldrim said. "In college you have to be up for every race — it's so much more competitive."

"Maureen really didn't have much competition during high school," LaFreniere said. "She's virtually untapped — she's just starting to develop her potential."

Meldrim jumped into the top level right away, finishing second to teammate Shana Smith in just her second collegiate meet, against Springfield College. She continued her performance right up to the New England Finals, where she was UMass' second runner, finishing an impressive 19th overall.

"I knew Maureen definitely had the talent to be in the top five for our team this season," LaFreniere said. "She's been one of my most consistent runners — the only spot in the top five she hasn't taken is first."

Overall I'm happy with how I'm doing," Meldrim said. "In the beginning of the season, I just wanted to break into the varsity seven in the worst way."

Although Johnson's season has been slowed by a sprained ankle she suffered early in the season, she has come on strongly of late. "The ankle was really tight for a while, and it was on my mind," Johnson said. "Over the last two weeks I just haven't worried about it, and that's helped my running."

Johnson's best performance of the season came in the Minutewomen's quad-meet victory over Rhode Island, Vermont and New Hampshire, where she finished fourth overall.

"We went out at a really fast pace that race, and I took the lead for much of the second mile," Johnson said. "It felt good to be in front — it was like high school again."

Both freshmen have benefitted from being part of a close-knit team with experienced upperclassmen such as senior captain Smith and junior Laura LaVallee.

"Becky and Maureen have a group of good role models like Shana and Laura and Michelle [St. Laurent] to help them," LaFreniere said. "I think they really enjoy having a team full of people of their own ability to run with."

"This team is great," Johnson said. "We're all really close, and my teammates have made me feel very much at home here."

LaFreniere couldn't be happier with the new additions to her team. "It'a really hard to expect freshmen to come and run well every week, like they've done," she said. "I hope they keep developing and become like Shana and Laura."

Five minutes later, Kerri Tashiro scored the first of her three goals as she took a pass from Black and deftly put a shot into the upper righthand corner past Curtis for a 2-1 lead.

UMass' offensive chances were pretty much held in check, with opportunities few and far betrween, and it took a free kick from Holly Hellmuth with nine seconds left in the half to tie the game at 2-2.

"We were really fortunate to go into halftime with a 2-2 tie," Rudy said.

UMass seemed to adapt to the altitude quite well in the opening minutes of the second half, but was unable to put the ball in the net to show for its efforts.

And again Tashiro, the senior captain, scored on a corner kick in the knock-down area with 25:40 left to put Colorado College on top for good.

The Reds continued their effort to tie the game for the third time, but it was soon realized that Colorado College had the upper hand on their home field (Stewart Field) and in their normal weather conditions.

Rudy decided to pull sweeper Kim Montgomery with about 10 minutes left in the game in order to match up 10 vs. 10 on the field.

"With 10 minutes left and down 3-2, we decided to pull our sweeper," Rudy said. "Lose by one, lose by three, it doesn't matter; we still get eliminated."

Rudy's strategy of trying to get back into the game quickly, did not pay off as the Tigers subsequently scored two goals within a two-minute span to lock the game up.

Tashiro picked up a loose ball in the crease and passed to Tanya Prime (of Hingham), who nailed a great shot into the top left corner to make it 4-2 with 7:43 to play.

Less than two minutes later, Tashiro completed the hat trick as she drove past Hellmuth and hit a wonderful shot off her right foot that got past Curtis.

Hellmuth, who has been the most consistent defender on the year for the Reds, had her hands full with Tashiro, who is the Tigers' leading scorer.

"She really got into the game, and there was no stopping her when she got the ball," Hellmuth said. "She just had incredible ball control."

"My swimmers know that they have to be patient, because we will swim fast at the end of the year," Newcomb said. "Three meets in seven days is tough, but at least now we have a good indication of what we have for the remainder of the season."

The Minutewomen may be 2-1, but Newcomb is happy with the results. UMass swims at the University of Maine next Sunday.

After a 65-yard option boot, Wilkos took it in from five yards for the first of his three touchdowns 3:53 into the game. Then linebacker Bobby Burke's fumble recovery set the Minutemen up for Wilkos' second score, a 14-yard untouched draw play just over a minute later.

But as quick as UMass was scoring, Villanova kept up the pace as Schulz hit tight end Scott Donald between four defenders just two plays later. Donald, with deceptive speed, outraced the pack for a 72-yard touchdown play.

Kennedy's (116 yards on 10 carries) 66-yard run to the 1-yard line led to a 1-yard dive by Schulz to tie it at 14-all after one quarter.

Jeff Johnson's three-yard run gave the 'Cats a 21-14 lead at the half, but UMass got two scores in the third.

Most encouraging for the Minutewomen was the fact that just 29 seconds separated the top five runners. "After Shana, our next four kids just bunched up and ran together," LaFreniere said. "This is the kind of day you dream about, where everybody just goes out and puts it all together."

LaFreniere was overjoyed with all aspects of her team's performance, particularly the way they handled the muddy course.

"There were some horrendous spots on the course — the kids were caked with mud," LaFreniere said. "Both Maureen Meldrim and Michelle St. Laurent ran into holes almost up to their knees.

With a young team (just one senior), UMass ended the season with a 6-2-1 record, a second-place finish in the New England Championships and their best ECAC finish in 10 years.

A double-dip in NCAA tournament play

• Tashiro, Colorado Coll. turn Reds blue, 5-2

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

COLORADO SPRINGS, Col. — The Rocky Mountain surroundings were breath-taking, but they also took the air out of the lungs of the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

The high altitude and thin air proved to be a factor, as Colorado College defeated the Reds, 5-2 yesterday to advance into the NCAA Final Four.

Colorado College, which last made the Final Four in 1986 and beat UMass in the semifinals on penalty kicks, is now 15-3. The Reds, who were eliminated in the quarterfinal round for the second straight year, finish their season at 12-4-4.

"The thing we missed the most that we do the best is that we pressurize very well," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "Usually our trademark is multiple-pressurization, but the altitude took that away from us."

Colorado College got on the board quickly. Midfielder Stacey Black beat her defender on the left side and put a shot on UMass goalkeeper Mary Curtis, who made the initial save. But Curtis dropped the ball and midfielder MaryClaire Robinson was there to put away the rebound just 6:17 into the game.

The Tigers were able to dominate most of the play, as they had good ball possession and good short passing, while the Reds had few opportunities in their attacking third of the field.

On one of three corner kicks on the day for UMass, senior Colette Bowler played a short corner to Becky Bonzano, whose pass into the box was headed in by April Kater at 27:40 to tie it at 1-1.

The women's soccer team saw its season come to a close yesterday with a 5-2 NCAA quarterfinal loss to Colorado College in Colorado Springs, Col.

• Field hockey edged by top seed ODU, 2-1

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The winds howled yesterday at Nickerson Field. In the first half, they blew over the goal cages twice. And then, Old Dominion University whistled past the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, 2-1, ending the Minutewomen's season in the second round of the NCAA tournament.

It was anything but a blowout though. The Minutewomen kept pace with the Lady Monarchs throughout the entire second half, shot for shot (each team had seven shots in the second half).

But ODU held off a late barrage by UMass in the last 10 minutes of the game to advance to the Final Four at Springfield College next weekend. That late surge, however, was not enough to offset a poor first half performance.

"We just fell asleep for a little while in the first half," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "We came out strong for the first few minutes but kind of let them take over the action."

The Minutewomen were quickly woken up when ODU's Annemee DeHaas scooped up a rebound in front of UMass goalie Phillipa Scott and gave the Lady Monarchs a 1-0 advantage, 11:50 into the game.

"We were just spectating on their first goal," Hixon said. "Scotty must have made three or four saves on the ball. We had Kerri [Fagan] and Smitty down there while everybody else was waiting for them to hit it out."

UMass still needed a cup of coffee before it was ready to get going though. The Lady Monarchs drew penalty corner after penalty corner (ODU had eight PCs in the first half). Fortunately for the Minutewomen, ODU's execution was off for a little while. But not all day.

The Lady Monarchs' Dutch star, Maaike Hilbrand, finally was able to get a slap shot off from the top of the circle and deposited it past Scott with 12:10 left in the half. The goal, Hilbrand's 45th of the year, gave ODU a commanding 2-0 lead going into halftime.

"Kerri and Kathy 'De' [Angelis] had to keep her away from the ball and just had to stop her," Hixon said. "I thought they did a great job. We only allowed her one goal. I think that's great."

Hilbrand's one goal was the difference though in ending the Minutewomen's season at 15-6-2. The Lady Monarchs in the meantime are 23-1 and bidding for their fifth national championship of this decade. ODU will go into next week's Final Four as the No. 1 seed in the tournament and defending national champion. The Lady Monarchs are undoubtably the college team of the '80s in field hockey.

But, UMass came close to spoiling all that in the latter stages of the game. UMass forward Beth Thornton ignited the Minutewomen with her sixth goal of the year with 14:05 left in regulation.

From there, the Minutewomen proceeded to take over the game, pinning the Lady Monarchs in their own end for most of the remaining minutes. UMass did everything but beat ODU goalie Kathy Fosina though.

"UMass took us out of it," ODU coach Beth Anders said. "They put a lot of pressure on us the second half and we panicked a little bit."

The Lady Monarchs had been resting for a week while UMass had played Boston University the day before in a game that went three overtimes and a shootout. The Minutewomen sustained a lot of bumps and bruises on Nickerson's artificial turf field before finally pulling out the contest in a shootout.

"We were a little bruised but that can't effect us," Hixon said. "You've got to keep going. There's no tomorrow. That's what tournament play is about."

UMass won the shootout 4-2 on goals by DeAngelis, Dawn Trumbauer, Smith, and Fagan. BU goalie Lori Heywood was almost helpless in goal.

"We're a very strong righthand stroking team and that is Lori Heywood's weakness," Hixon said.

Minutemen can't tame the Wildcats, 29-26

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

VILLANOVA, Pa. — When Jerome Bledsoe and Gary Wilkos were together in the lineup, the option game was effective for the University of Massachusetts football team.

But as Bledsoe, and later Wilkos went out of the lineup, the Minutemen ran out of options. Villanova University took advantage and rallied to beat UMass, 29-26 in a Yankee Conference game Saturday at Villanova Stadium.

Quarterback Kirk Schulz found split end Robert Brady from 21 yards out with 4:15 to play to put Villanova on top for good. UMass twice attempted to rally in the final minutes, but fell short both times.

"It was a fun game up until the last five minutes," UMass coach Jim Reid said. "We swung the momentum in the third quarter, but we needed one more score."

The Minutemen, after scoring a pair of touchdowns in the first six minutes of the game, found themselves down 21-14 entering the second half. Behind Wilkos, who for the second straight week both rushed for and threw for 100 yards (152 by land, 146 by air), UMass took control with another pair of TDs in the third quarter.

However, as UMass was driving possibly toward that one more score, Wilkos was hit in the groin area on the first play of the fourth quarter and had to be carried off the field.

On the next play, substitute QB Paul Tornatore fumbled the snap, Villanova recovered and the last real chance for UMass went by the boards.

But still holding a 26-21 lead, UMass needed to turn it on defensively. It had the Wildcats reeling after linebacker Matt Tulley picked up one of his three sacks on the day, mauling Schulz for a 6-yard loss to the 39.

That was the last stop UMass would make on the drive. On second down, Schulz hit Scott Kingsbury for 12 yards and tailback Pat Kennedy for 28 to the UMass 21. On the next play, Brady cut into the right corner of the end zone on a down-and-out pattern and snagged the winning points.

Tornatore was intercepted on the next drive, but Villanova was unable to run out the clock, with cornerback Don Caparotti's interception in the end zone giving the Minutemen on last gasp with 1:27 to go. But Tornatore was sacked twice and came up short on a last-play desparation pass.

"We didn't give him an awful lot of protection," Reid said of Tornatore. "I thought we played hard, and I thought we played tough. But the kicking game hurt us."

Kicker Marco Gabrielli missed an extra point in the first quarter and later missed a field goal and had a PAT blocked.

Women's swimming falls to UConn

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Correspondent

With the talk of the student strike filling the air, the women's swimming team took their unblemished 2-0 record into Saturday afternoon's meet with the University of Connecticut at Boyden Pool.

The Minutewomen received excellent performances from captain Keira Cruz, senior Michele Leary and Denise Reimer. But the effort of these three went to waste as the Huskies defeated UMass 139-103.

"UConn is just a great team," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb. "They sent swimmer after swimmer at us, and we just could not match their depth."

The day was not a total waste for the Minutewomen, as Leary won the 200-yard freestyle and the 500-yard freestyle. Leary continues to impress, and seems well on her way to a trip to the Nationals, at the end of the season.

Reimer, whose two victories came in the 100- and 50-yard freestyle is quickly becoming a pleasant surprise for Newcomb. Another awakening took place on Saturday, diver Stephanie Tuttle who had not been diving well, finished third in both diving events.

Because of space restrictions, we were unable to run complete stories on the men's and women's basketball exhibitions from Saturday night. The men lost in the final minute to Sodertajle, Sweden, 89-88, while the women defeated Amager of Denmark, 67-54.

Full stories on these games, as well as the men's cross country and water polo results from this weekend, will be included in tomorrow's Collegian.

Women's x-c 10th in ECACs

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team proved Saturday at the ECAC championships the old adage that competition brings out the best in a team.

The Minutewomen finished 10th overall, their best finish in 10 years. Villanova, ranked number one in the nation, took first with 65 points, nipping rival Georgetown (67). UMass finished fifth among Region I (New England) teams in the race held at Waveny Park in New Canaan, Conn.

Captain Shana Smith led the way for UM, as she's done all season, finishing 48th overall in a time of 18:21. "Shana just went out and led the team from start to finish," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "Right before the race, she told everyone to run together in a pack, which is exactly what they did."

Consistent junior Laura LaVallee raised her always-strong performance several more notches, finishing 61st (18:31). "This was definitely Laura's best race of the season," LaFreniere said. Freshman Maureen Meldrim ran 81st with a time of 18:42.

Sophomore Michelle St. Laurent was the surprise of the meet, grabbing 88th with a time of 18:45. "Michelle went out extremely fast and really hung on — she ran hard for the team," LaFreniere said. "I think Michelle really shocked a lot of people with her performance out there."

Rounding out the UMass seven were freshman Becky Johnson (93rd, 18:50), junior Kathy Holt (135th, 19:33) and first-year sophomore Tara Hughes (169th, 20:35).

ANSWERS TO SOME COMMON QUESTIONS--VOTER REGISTRATION AT U/MASS

Why vote in my hometown district instead of Amherst?

Two reasons. FIRST, if we all register to be Amherst voters, then we all vote to elect only one Representative and one Senator to speak on our behalf in the State House. We already have Rosenberg and Olver, but it isn't doing much good. They can't change things by themselves. What we need is legislators from all over the state to be tuned in to the issues and importance of what's happening to higher education in Massachusetts. That's what we'll have when all of Massachusetts' students are voters in their hometowns, when candidates realize that students are not to be ignored.

SECOND, it's better for students to register to be hometown voters because the hometown address doesn't change as often as the school address. Voters have to make sure their voting address is always up to date in the Registrar's computer. Suppose you register in Amherst with your current address, 204 Johnson. Then suppose you move to 506 Johnson and forget to change your address at Town Hall. Then, suppose you sign a petition with your new address. YOUR SIGNATURE WILL NOT COUNT because the address on the petition will not be the same address that's on file with your registration.

Do I have to go home to vote if I'm registered at home?
NO. You can very easily get an absentee ballot. At the Amherst Town Hall there is a form you fill out to request a ballot from the town where you're registered. You get the ballot in the mail, you fill it out (vote), and you mail it back so it gets there before the polls close.

Do I have to choose a party when I register?
No. You can register as an Independent voter. Being an Independent doesn't limit your options in any way. When it's time to vote in a primary election (when Democrats pick a Democratic candidate and Republicans pick a Republican candidate) then you say which ballot you want. In a general election, when the choice is between one Republican and one Democrat, everyone gets the same ballot so it doesn't matter what party you registered for. You DON'T have to declare a party when you register.

What do I have to do to register?
Just go to the table and fill out a form. You don't need any ID. It's the honor system.

Who is behind this voter registration drive?
A small group of older undergraduates who live together on a floor in McNamara have organized it, and many others have been very helpful. We have worked very had to make sure that this project didn't get tangled up with anyone's politics. We aren't promoting any one party, nor are we promoting any particular petition. We are promoting citizen participation in government. The education situation proves that government does indeed have an effect on our inidividual lives. It's time we had an effect on government.

Of those 20,000 demonstrators, how many do you think were voters? 2,000? 1,000? The demonstration in Boston was a great first step. However, politicians listen best to voters. They don't bother with people who don't bother to vote. The solution is obvious. REGISTER TO VOTE. Help U Mass send a message and set an example for other state colleges and universities.

Afternoon rally gathers support

View from the top of the Campus Center garage of yesterday's rally at the Student Union. About 2,000 people showed up for the afternoon rally.

Students must let legislators know that they will be supported at reelection time if they vote for tax reform now, a University of Massachusetts history professor told a lively crowd of about 2,000 striking students at a rally against budget cuts yesterday afternoon.

"It's important to get to Boston and convince representatives and senators that you will support them if they support you," Bruce Laurie shouted through a bullhorn in front of the Student Union. "If you don't support tax reform you have no reason being on strike."

Although legislative support for increased taxes has been gaining momentum, there are still 45 to 50 representatives who have not been convinced to vote for new taxes, Laurie said, as the crowd roared in return, "They'll be looking for new jobs soon," and "We won't vote for them."

The sea of protestors held homemade cardboard signs which read "Support our strike, save our school," and "No slogan due to budget cuts." Prior to the rally about 400 protestors marched through the Student Union and Campus Center Complex chanting "Strike! Strike! Strike! Education is our right," and "Get off your ass and help UMass."

The Legislature should increase taxes for corporations and wealthy individuals, Laurie said.

"The tax burden should be placed on those most able to bear it," he said. "And those who can afford to bear it are no longer students. This is a public institution and deserves public support."

About 40,000 Massachusetts corporations paid less than $500 in state taxes last year and the Bank of Boston paid no state tax at all, he said.

"They can afford to pay it. You know it. I know it. Now we must convince others," he said, as the students roared with approval.

"Keep together, organize effectively, and make it clear that the people who are supposed to run this state better start running it," Laurie exclaimed as cheers broke out and chants of "Strike! Strike! Strike!" shook the crowd.

Angus McQuilkan, a senator from the commuter area government and a strike picket captain, said he was walking across Haigus Mall yesterday morning with a picket sign when an elementary school teacher escorting her students said, "you kids should be in classes."

"First of all I told her I'm an adult and I vote in this state," he said. "Then I said 'What's the use of going to classes now when we won't have any next semester? And what's the use of earning degree that is not respected by industry?'"

Binky Feldman, a strike organizer and undergraduate student senator, said the future of all the students at UMass are in jeopardy. She acknowledged that some students may be nervous about missing classes and picketing buildings.

"But it works and we'll keep on doing it until every student is behind us," she said. "All students have to come together."

Students strike for education

About two-thirds of students boycott classes

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

About two-thirds of students at the University of Massachusetts went on strike yesterday, the first official day of action against newly-proposed cuts to the public higher education system in Massachusetts.

"That means 12,000 students out of 18,000 were out of their classes," said Brian Crawford, member of the Union of Undergraduates, the group organizing the strike.

Approximately 300 students arrived bundled against the cold in the Student Union Ballroom at 7:30 yesterday morning to begin the first day of picketing.

Ranks of picketers rose to 2,000 throughout the day as they targeted eight buildings on campus — Mahar Auditorium and the School of Management, Herter Hall, Fine Arts Center, Morrill Science Center and Hasbrouck Laboratory, Thompson Hall, Bartlett and Tobin Halls, and Marston Hall.

Jean Graham, a 21-year-old engineering student from Haverhill said, "Five years from now when these students who refuse to picket graduate, their degree will mean a lot less than it did previously, because the quality of this University will continue to go down if we do nothing."

Graham was in charge of picketing at Marston, an engineering building chosen because the engineering department has been particularly reticent to support the strike.

An encouraging sign occurred early in the picketing of Marston when Dean Nancy Hellman emerged from the building to show support for students by wearing a white arm-band.

When asked why she chose to support students, Dean Hellman said, "We should be supporting their efforts as professors, they are our students."

Steven Merther, a 20-year-old psychology major, did not know yesterday whether or not he should strike.

"I'm not attending today. I feel guilty crossing the lines. I'm going to wait until tomorrow to see what happens," he said.

Dawn Hamel, a 24-year-old nursing student, was picketing the Morrill Science Center with 15 other students early in the morning.

She was striking because the Nursing department has been slashed by the budget cuts, she said.

"Next year 16 students will be let into the program, and when there's a national shortage of nurses, that's not the thing to do," she said.

Faculty torn on strike

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Many faculty members said they support the goals of the student strike, which are to prevent further state budget cuts to higher education and social services, but are skeptical about its effectiveness.

Michael Peters, an entomology professor, said Sunday he believes the strike will not be effective because it disrupts the campus community more than the Legislature.

"I don't think striking on campus is a realistic way to protest," he said. "The state is screwing things up, not the University."

Peters said he would not penalize students participating in the strike who miss class, and would make arrangements with them to make up missed work.

Ann Ferguson, a philosophy professor, said she taught her class in the Student Union building yesterday and cancelled her main lecture tomorrow. She said she supports the strike because it is in the best interest for the future of UMass.

"Putting fees on the people who can least afford to pay them is unfair and undemocratic," she said. "The strike may not be the solution to the problem, but it creates solidarity and is a positive step."

Richard Edwards, the chairman of the economics department, said he did not recommend to economic professors how to conduct their class sections during the strike.

Cuts also hurt welfare agency

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is not the only state agency suffering from recent budget cuts, according to state and local officials of public welfare and education.

John Thompson, director of the Public Welfare office in Northampton, said, "We are expecting that the cuts coming from the legislature will be devastating — $7.8 million out of public welfare."

If funds are cut it could mean up to 400 people could be laid off state-wide by Christmas, he said. The lay-offs would target mostly managers, social workers, and support staff, he said.

Thompson added that without proper supervision of welfare clients, the cuts would be counter-productive. Public money would be wasted if ineligible people continue to receive support, he said.

"We are a very lean office right now," he said. "There is simply no excess personnel making it easier for everyone in this office. We are at the nub."

Graduate students draft letter to help curb education cuts

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

A graduate class yesterday used class time to write a draft letter students can send to the Legislature, urging lawmakers to support legislation that will stop cuts to public higher education.

Professor Jack Wideman gave his Theories and Procedures of Counseling class the idea by reading them a letter that spoke of the serious effects the proposed cut in Teaching Assistants funding could have on graduate students.

Don Morris, a TA in the counseling office said, "We began to feel helpless and felt we weren't being represented well enough."

Morris suggested that his class write a letter to the legislatures expressing their concern over the proposed cut.

"My class usually has about 33 students in it," said Wideman. "But today there were 24 and students spoke that don't ordinarily speak. I was very proud of them."

Wideman said about 20 students participated in composing the letter. After 45 minutes of brainstorming and collecting ideas, the students produced a letter that said they "earnestly oppose any further cuts in education, especially '03 funds' at the University of Massachusetts."

Eighty-three percent of the "03 fund' supports graduate assistants, student employees, and part-time instructors. The work of graduate assistants is essential to ensure the "effective function of most, if not all, educational programs, especially in light of the recent cuts in faculty," the letter also said.

The top of the letter leaves a space, where students can write their legislator's name. Finally, the letter urges the representative to support amendments that would spare further cuts in '03 accounts.'

The letters will be distributed through the Newman Center, and tentatively through the strike headquarters in the Student Union.

Wideman expects the students to take the letter to their other classes and discuss the situation.

"It is always time to take action," against wrongs, Wideman said.

Students organize to protest strike

By LISA MILLEGAN
Collegian Correspondent

A group of about ten students has formed an organization "scabs united" to protest the Union of Undergraduates' school-wide strike.

Led by University of Massachusetts republican newspaper, The Minutemen, the group is headquartered in The Minuteman office in the Student Union. According to Minuteman Editor in Chief Matthew Whiting, the organization is intended to offer support to students who choose to attend classes.

"I went to all my classes and I think the strike is absolutely ludicrous," Whiting said. "First of all, the motives of the PSRU (People For A Socially Responsible University) are highly questionable for sponsoring the strike. They're always looking for something to take over. They're for education and they don't go to class — it's silly."

Instead of proposing new taxes to solve the University's budget crisis, "scabs united" is supporting the elimination of waste in the bureaucracy at the Whitmore Administration Building. Associate editor of The Minutemen, Jim Black said that up to 33 percent of the positions at Whitmore could be eliminated. "Scabs" reject the strikers' proposal of a sales tax because they say the tax would most hurt people with the least ability to pay. "I only pay tuition once, but taxes I pay for life," said Whiting.

The "scabs" also reject increased corporate taxes. "What will happen is corporations will head to New Hamphsire and leave Massachusetts citizens without jobs," he said.

The "scabs" aren't very concerned about proposed tuition hikes for out-of-state students. "Who cares?" said scab member Mike Geng. "They aren't paying taxes in this state."

"UMass is a bargain," said Whiting. "At University of Vermont, out of state tuition is $18,000."

"Scabs united" predicts the strike will fizzle out in a few days. "(The strikers) are mostly naive children that don't understand how the world works. It's fun to pretend you're in the 60's and carry signs but it isn't going to work." Geng said.

Students waiting for state money can stay in school

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Gov. Dukakis told the Student Advisory Committee last night in a Boston meeting that students who have been waiting to receive their Massachusetts State Scholarships to pay tuition will not be forced to withdraw from the University, Student Government Association President Traci Davis said.

Tuition balances were applied to students' lab fee bills, which are due today, Davis said. Davis said Dukasis did not make the same guarantee for students awaiting Pell Grants because those monies are federal and beyond his control.

"It was a very tense meeting," Davis said. "Dukakis was informed of our strike and had no comment, but urged us to put pressure on the legislators," Davis said.

SGA has planned a Boston lobbying trip tomorrow, which will target representatives who are swing votes on an amendment that could restore money to the University of Massachusetts budget.

The amendment, sponsored by Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst), proposes to give back about $20 million to the education budget and would kill $6.5 in new cuts, said John Dnulap, undergraduate student senate speaker and a coordinator of the trip.

First preference for the 43 seats on the bus provided by the Chancellor's office will go to students who live within the target representatives' districts, he said.

A full listing of about 50 towns which are represented by influential voters will be posted in the Commuter Area Government Office.

The group hopes that by lobbying influential voters, more representatives will support the amendment, Dunlap said.

The group plans to leave Amherst at 9 a.m. and stay until mid-afternoon, Dunlap said.

Director of State Relations Sharon Kennaugh and Budget Director Joyce Hatch will hold an open workshop on effective lobbying techniques and strategies at 3 p.m. Tuesday in the Student Union Ballroom, Dunlap said.

Board of Governors gives money

BOG pays loan for Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors voted overwhelmingly last Thursday to contribute $200 to the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance.

Gov. Shannon Bourke, an LBGA member, said the alliance took a $200 loan from the Counciling Coalition two weeks ago, and the loan is due next week.

She said 22 of the 23 awareness week events were held at the Campus Center. The BOG allocates space in the Student Union/Campus Center complex. The LBGA will use the money to defer the costs of the $4200 Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Awareness week which ran from Nov. 2 until last Tuesday.

The Board of Governors Program Council has given the LBGA $400 for the their awareness programs in each of the past two years. But Jeff Glassman, the program council coordinator, said the council could not afford to contribute this year. The LBGA then petitioned the board which has a reserve account that can be used to sponsor a variety events, said Lisa Balentine the BOG treasurer.

Glassman said the program council's $21,000 budget limits the number of yearly shows it can sponsor to about eight. He tries to organize events that will attract the greatest number of students.

Gov. Beth Dacey recommended the board give the group the money because they sponsored events that appeal to students the program council may not cater to.

"If a group wants to present diverse programming, then we should give them the money to do so," she said.

The board does not have a policy to appropriate money from their reserve account to student organizations. The approved motion stipulates that before the BOG considers contributing to other student groups it has to create guidelines for students seeking money from the reserve account. The deadline for creating that account is Feb. 15.

Gov. Bill Hewitt, who spoke against the motion, said the board must carefully consider all decisions that set a precedent.

"I know of no responsible governing board that would allocate money without a set of guidelines," he said.

Gov. Holly Williamson said it would be irresponsible of the board to deny LBGA the money.

"I don't think the [LBGA] should be punished for helping the board get its act together," she said.

The board voted its approval 11-3 with one abstention.

In other business: Campus Center director Bill Harris urged the governors to "make a statement" by participating in the student strike.

He also reminded them to register to vote at the upcoming voter registration which will be held at the Campus Center on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday.

Glassman announced that Murray D's, a Campus Center dance club, will cease operations effective this past Friday, due to a lack of clientelle.

University construction to be complete by Christmas

By WILLIAM FLEISHMAN
Collegian Staff

The construction around campus should be completed sometime in mid-December, according to Randy Salem, director of the telecommunications network service .

"It's progressing along as scheduled," he said. "We want to complete the excavations before Christmas," Salem said.

The excavations are part of the University's new $30 million telecommunications project. Once completed, the system will be one of the most modern services available, Salem.

"The project will provide a digital system, as opposed to the traditional analog system we're currently using," Salem said. "It will provide, among other things, extremely clear communication — kind of like the difference between CDs and tapes."

The Ericsson Co., which manufactures the system as well as contracts the labor, is planning to pull the wires through the conduits throughout the winter and finish up work in some of the classroom buildings by the first day of March.

Salem said the money for the system, which will also encompass the Boston and Worcester campuses, was allocated before the budget cuts were proposed.

"The state gave us 15.4 million dollars for the project," he said. "We're not allowed [by the state] to use the money for anything else." he said.

The system will cost students an additional $50 per semester. Some of the capabilities this fee will include:

- call forwarding
- conference calling
- three or more way calling
- ability to send a call to a different room
- quicker computer processing through phone lines
- ability to use modem and phone line simultaneously
- cable television access

The University is planning to have the new system operational in time for the fall semester, Salem said.

Graduate students to meet, decide whether to strike

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate is scheduled to hold a general meeting of all graduate students at 7 p.m. tonight in room 163 in the Campus Center.

GSS leaders plan to discuss the Union of Undergraduates' strike and recent developments in the state budget, focusing on the '03' account, said Marc Kenen, a special assistant to the GSS. The '03' account funds teaching assistants and is jeopardy of being cut by 20 percent in the near future, he said.

After the graduate students express their opinions, they may be asked to vote their support to the student strike and decide whether to join their undergraduate counterparts.

Renee Heberle, co-spokesperson for the Graduate Employees Organization, said the GEO Coordinating Committee is calling for a membership meeting tomorrow in the Student Union Ballroom in order to vote on a work stoppage for Thursday and Friday.

The committee plans to recommend to strike to their members and a majority vote is needed to endorse the strike proposal, she said.

She said if the proposed 20 percent cut in the state's '03' is passed, all 1400 teaching assistants could be fired within 30 days and 80 percent would be rehired back at a later date, Heberle said.

Students to give thanks

By JOHN PATRICK MUSULIN
Collegian Staff

As the holiday season approaches, thoughts of extravagant Thanksgiving feasts make our stomachs grumble and our mouths water. We look forward to the reprieve from schoolwork and visiting family and friends.

Many people in the community, however, do not enjoy these luxuries. To them, holidays are only a reminder that they are less fortunate than others.

In order to help these people, the Newman Student Association is running their Annual Thanksgiving Food Drive.

People interested in the Food Drive may bring non-perishable food items or monetary donations to the Newman Center until November 19. Boxes have been placed in the corridor inside the main entrance for the food donations.

Volunteers are also needed on the 19th to help organize the donations into gift baskets, and on the 20th and 21st to help deliver the baskets. Those able to help should go to the Newman center or call

Steven Tierney, Co-Chair of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus said last Wednesday night that although the new Gay Civil Rights Bill, which will be signed into law tomorrow "will make history in Massachusetts," there is still a need for the gay community to work for their rights.

Speaking in the Campus Center as part of Gay, Lesbian Bisexual Awareness Week, Tierney said the gay community needs to redefine itself in order to create a more supportive community and change the way people think about homosexuality.

He said a Kinsey study conservatively put the number of homosexuals in the state at 600,000, but a recent Gallop Poll stated that 67 percent of the population said they did not know anyone who is gay, and 51 percent said they didn't accept department are holding class, but devoting the time to a discussion of the impact of the budget cuts on the University, he said.

"We wanted to support the students who are participating in the strike," he said. "But we also want to preserve for students who want to attend classes, and instructors who want to hold class, the right to do that," he said.

"The students have taken a lead and need to be supported," he said. "They are acting for all people in the University community."

Edwards said the strike alone will not influence legislators' voting priorities.

"My concern is that the people who control the Legislature won't care that much if UMass students are on strike," he said. "The strike can only be effective if people off campus care about what happens, or if the strikers mobilize to take further action, like another demonstration in Boston."

George Sulzner, the chair of the political science department, said he, along with Edwards, is a member of the Chairs for the Future of the University. The group formed recently to discuss budget issues. So far about 35 department chairpersons are members of the organization.

Haircuts raise money for diabetes

By PETER LEON
Collegian Staff

Sunday, 145 people needing a hair cut went to the center of Amherst, in order to support Juvenile Diabetes (JD) research. The cut-a-thon, raising an estimated $1200 for JD was sponsored by Hair East. The hair stylists donated all their time and proceeds from the $8 wash, cut and dry to funding research.

Dave Kirk, an Amherst College senior said, "I could have come Friday, but I saw the ad and decided to wait. It is for a social cause, and is cheaper. The combination couldn't be beat."

The event was organized by Lucille Ancicello and Joan Karam of the Greater Springfield Juvenile Diabetes Foundation.

Karam is the mother of a 12 year old girl with JD. "The fund- raising started with a walk-a-thon in early October, and that is when the West Springfield store had offered to hold a cut-a-thon. It was held about three weeks ago, and it was a big success. So they decided to have one here in Amherst on a bigger scale," she said.

Diabetes has no known causes, but it has been diagnosed as a metabolic disease. People who have the disease are unable to produce enough insulin in their bodies. Insulin regulates how much glucose the body can use. If there is not enough insulin the body can't convert the glucose into the energy the body needs to function.

Anyone who is diagnosed with JD must receive shots of insulin everyday to help metabolize their food. Most people get JD when they are children, but any person in any age group with the disease is referred to as having JD.

Living with someone with diabetes is a daily struggle with worry and concern. Karen Eastman, who has a 16-year-old brother with JD said she had to "give him daily shots, sugar and make sure he got enough to eat. There was always time for anxiety when he was with other people who might not know what to do if he were to have a reaction."

A diabetic can have a reaction to not having enough blood sugars, which appears as something like a seizure with heavy sweating and shakes. This is treated with an ingestion of sugar, like a soda or a tablet. A diabetic coma occurs when there is too much sugar remaining in the blood over a long period of time, resulting in necessary hospitalization.

"I give these girls a lot of credit, they give their day off and all the money goes to research. Some of the grants go to the Joslin Clinic in Boston and others to UMass Worcester (Hospital)," said Karam.

"None of us here are being penalized for missing classes, we'll just have to see how it goes."

Pre-registration is going on this week and strike organizers, picketers, and faculty are encouraging students to complete the forms.

Carrying homemade signs and with papers taped to the backs of jackets stating, "UMass on Strike: United We Stand," picketers and other students came together for an afternoon rally at the Student Union steps.

Crawford, a strike organizer, said he's excited about the response today, and only expects the momentum to pick up.

"A lot of professors were honoring picket lines and not entering classes, as were students, we're very excited," he said.

Stressing the importance of informing people of their stand Crawford said, "It's really important that students call their professors and friends."

Study rooms will be available to students starting tomorrow afternoon until the end of the strike. "We recognize that there are some students that absolutely have to study," Crawford said.

Different groups unified by common struggle

By THOMAS A. GEORGE
Collegian Corespondant

Although women, Blacks, gays and lesbians, each face different problems, they are unified because their struggle for rights has meant a redefinition of their roles and identities, cultural historian Henry Ablelove said at an Amherst College lecture last week.

This identity is "marked by openness, defiance, pride and self-activity," Ablelove said.

He said women and Blacks face a "culture-wide fascination with problems of representation."

"While blacks are proud of their heritage, they also are trying to obliterate race, and women who are proud of their sex have worked to erase femininity," he said.

He said that historians who fall on the left side of the political spectrum have tried to focus on each group's struggle for recognition.

"[They] provide first a focus on the struggle for emergence in society, not a focus on the legitimacy of the group itself," he said.

Although Ablelove discussed women and Blacks, he focused primarily on how lesbians and gay men view themselves.

"A remarkable resurgeance of writing has taken place since the Stonewall incident of 1969," a landmark in the movement for the rights of lesbians and gays.

"Even the New York Times uses the term anal intercourse in news stories, which I never would have imagined when I was an undergraduate," he said.

Ablelove said that in one of the United States history textbooks used by students today, the "text contains a small insert on the history of lesbians and gays in the United States, which is exactly 79 words long."

"It does mention the ludicrous efforts of the psychiatric community to diagnose homosexuality as a disease, but concludes with a joke," he said. "It is almost as if it is to be mentioned at all, it should be comic."

Abelove said he helped a Wesleyan student who was to be committed to a mental institution by her parents for being a lesbian.

He arranged for her to receive legal consultation, as well as giving her moral support. He said she won the case against her parents for freedom

The social role of homosexuality has been overlooked, he said. He added that looking at the cause has provided him with inconclusive answers.

Peace Corps membership on the rise

Campus recruiters say many attend information sessions

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Correspondent

Although the Peace Corps, begun in 1961 by John F. Kennedy, lately has not attracted as many volunteers as it did in the late 1960's, interest in joining is on the uprise, said Jean Johnson, one of the newly-hired campus recruiters for the Peace Corps.

"The Peace Corps office in Draper Hall provides information, assistance, and encouragement to students interested in doing volunteer work in underdeveloped countries," said Johnson, a gradute student at the University of Massachusetts.

"We have a lot of people coming into the office, and a lot of people at the information sessions," she said.

There were about 60 people at the first session and at least that many people are expected at today's session, she said.

The Peace Corps sends trained volunteers to developing countries around the world at the invitation of host governments, she said. There, volunteers teach people new ways to fight problems such as hunger, disease, and lack of education and opportunity, she said.

Cary Farley, also a UMass graduate students and campus recruiter, keep regular hours in the Draper Hall office.

In addition, interested students can conduct two Peace Corps information sessions each semester.

"We're not really trying to sell the Peace Corps," Johnson said. "We're trying to inform people and help them decide."

Farley, who is studying geography at UMass, has worked in Zaire as an agriculture extension volunteer. Farley graduated from Plymouth State College with a degree in history and geography.

Johnson, who is currently enrolled in a Ph.D. program in educational media, worked with the Peace Corps teaching English in Thailand in the late 60's. She then received a Fulbright scholarship and worked as a United Press International war correspondent in Vietnam. She has also taught English in Saudi Arabia and Oman.

Last year the UMass campus nominated 40 people for the Peace Corps, Johnson said.

She said there are three steps toward becoming a Peace Corps volunteer — application, nomination, and an invitation to serve abroad. Most applicants who are nominated but are not chosen as volunteers also receive an invitation, she said.

Because the Peace Corps only accepts applications from people who are graduating seniors or older, a major function of the office is advising students who plan to work with the Peace Corps after graduation, and want to know how they can improve their qualifications, she said.

Johnson said that in its earliest days, the Peace Corps requested mostly generalists to work as English teachers and community developers, but that has since changed.

"It's much more skill oriented now," she said. "Countries are asking for people skilled in science, special education, agriculture, forestry, and health."

Although there is a Peace Corps office in Boston, William Strack, manager of the Peace Corps' New England recruiting office, said he considers Johnson and Farley's work to be very important.

"The on-campus position is a crucial contribution to our recruiting activities," he said. "Its presence on campus makes Peace Corps news more accessible to students and allows the agency to share information about current country requests in a more timely manner," he said.

Sister Millie, an advisor to the NSA, said, "The program started about ten years ago and involved only a few students."

Over the years the program has grown so large that this Thanksgiving they hope to deliver food baskets to approximately 90 needy families and elderly people.

She said the program started because the people believed that, "Thanksgiving is more than thanksgiving; it's also giving. We express our thanks for our blessings by giving to those who are less fortunate."

Lynn Minasian, a UMass senior and one of the cochairpersons of the Food Drive, echoed Sister Millie's sentiments, "The Newman Student Association does this to help others who are less fortunate than ourselves and to give thanks for what we have during the Thanksgiving season."

Area merchants involved in the Food Drive include Price Chopper, Bread and Circus, Stop and Shop and Louis Foods.

Louis Foods is offering a reimbursement program. For any receipts totalling $30 or more, they will contribute 5 percent to the drive. This money is to be used toward the purchase of turkeys. People should have their receipts validated at the courtesy desk and drop them off there or at the Newman Center.

Dick Vincent, owner of Louis Foods, said, "Several years ago, students approached us with the idea. We thought it was a worthwhile thing to do and that it benefited needy people, so we got involved."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Keep alternative strategies in mind

This first part is written for all freshpeople.

You've been here for about 10 weeks.

Not quite what you saw on the tour, huh?

Some of you are probably considering transferring, given the protests, rallies, strikes, budget cuts, racist acts, date rapes, stringent policies, oversubscribed classes, oversized classes, smelly dorms, etc. But before you leave, remember there's more than pain at the University of Massachusetts.

There's nothing better than putting on a heavy coat on a brisk November day, seeing a UMass football game and listening to the Minuteman Marching Band. En route to the game, there's nothing better than stopping in the Student Union, buying a big box of popcorn and feeding the ducks.

When the sun hits the pond on a bright blue day, and you're feeding those toddling, quacking ducks, take time out to watch the sun hit the water. Take a deep breath and note there are some things left that the Legislature can't screw up.

Okay, so day one of the strike went well. Now what? Just Day 2? C'mon.

Most students won't strike for more than a couple of days, no matter how many assurances they have that there will be no penalties. Seniors still want to graduate on time. Others are scared that they'll fall behind in their classes. Professors will begin to teach classes again.

Will we let things go back to normal?

The strike was BIG; from that we should think BIGGER. How about these ideas:

- Hands Across Massachusetts: Organize with the other 28 public colleges and universities and pick a day. Form a human chain along the Pike from the New York state line to the Atlantic Ocean.
- A marathon softball game to raise money for financial aid and teaching assistant salaries: Hold the game in Alumni stadium and play until we drop. Have people sponsor individual players, giving a penny for each inning played. If everyone found sponsors, we'd raise several thousand dollars.
- Diversify the fees being raised: Get someone else to pay money, like five-college students. Why can't we charge our neighboring schools' students a fee for taking classes at UMass? For taking books out of the Tower Library? If there are 1,000 five-college students who take classes each semester, and we charge each of them $20 a class, that's an additional $40,000 a year. If a five-college student is charged a quarter for taking out a book from the library, that's extra revenue for us. Needy students could have costs waived.
- Let's go dramatic: Put lights on the Tower Library, forming a pattern that spells "NO MORE CUTS.'

The point of any BIG idea is to show that the world does not revolve around the state's legislators. The sun does not shine only on House Speaker George Keverian (although he could serve as a human eclipse). UMass-Amherst can be somewhat self-sufficient.

We have to start taking the offensive. If UMass is continuously hurt by cuts, then we have to diffuse the pain as much as possible. At the same time, we can't stop the pressure. We have to continue finding creative, dramatic ways to make the public aware and force the Legislature to change.

People must understand UMass is for real.

We deserve facts about campus violence

What is really going on at this University? We, as students don't know. Why? Because the Director of Public Safety, Arthur Hilson said he wants to protect victims of rape, discrimination and other acts of malicious behavior.

He is not protecting anyone. In the long run, he is putting the safety of students, especially women, at risk.

Beth Gately

A study released last Tuesday by the Student Affairs and Research Evaluation Office estimated that 13 percent of undergraduate women at UMass have been date raped and another 10 percent are victims of attempted date rape while at UMass.

If my math is correct, based on a female undergraduate population of 10,000, 1,300 women have been date raped. According to the date rape study, only three percent reported the rape to police. That is still 39 women who contacted the police.

Keep in mind, this is just date rape, not including rape by a stranger.

Why don't we hear about these incidents? Censorship maybe?

I am a senior and I don't remember ever reading about any incident of rape here at UMass. One may think it is the Collegian's policy to not print rape stories. Wrong. If the information was available, it would be printed, as a service to students.

I have picked up the cop reports from the police station since last semester and have written stories from the reports. Not once have I come across a report of rape or date rape in the log. Did the typist overlook those specific entries by mistake? I doubt it.

Several students stormed the police station last month and asked Dr. Hilson a few questions. They asked why racial incidents and rape on campus were not exactly public information. Specifically, the students asked why rapes are not published in the police reports.

Hilson said the Sensitive Crime Unit investigates rapes, to protect the victims.

Dr. Hilson, we don't want to know who was raped, but we do want to know that someone was raped and where it happened. Knowing these things warns students. It relays the message that rape is a problem on this campus, as it is on most campuses in the country. It also warns women of the "hot spots" on campus where rape occurs. These facts also dispel the myth that, "It won't happen to me," or "Rape isn't a problem here."

Hilson also said, at the meeting with students, that each emergency call made to the Department of Public Safety is logged and printed in the police report. Why isn't rape included? Even if the case is investigated by Sensitive Crimes, the police took the call first and did respond.

Whenever there is an entry in the log that implies violence against women, Hilson and his spokesmen are tight-lipped.

I called the station about a particular case, an assault and battery that occurred on Sept. 15, in which a male, 19, was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for hand injuries. The man hit two female victims, according to the police report.

If the man injured his hand, what happened to the women, I thought. I called Hilson for more information. Were the women treated? Did they identify the man? What were the circumstances surrounding the attack?

"We can't give any more information. The case is under investigation. Thanks."

Dr. Hilson, why are these things kept from students? Is secrecy or censorship really protecting students?

Who is Hilson really protecting? Maybe himself, he wouldn't want to deny making another statement, or maybe he thinks it would reflect poorly on his department.

Obviously, there are problems on this campus. Keeping them from students or sweeping them under the rug are not solutions. The first step to remedy such a cultural illnesses is to confront the issues. To do so, we must know they occurred.

How about a little cooperation?

Beth Gately is a Collegian staff member

Irresponsible column

Minu Sebastian's column ("Students Are Here To Learn," Nov.9) criticizing a University professor's exam format was irresponsible at best. The entire article was based on Sebastian's misinterpretation of the professor's statement "I generate a 30 percent wrong answer rate". This simply means that the class average on his exams is usually about 70 percent.

But, in the spirit of a Collegian editorial, Sebastian suggests that "he actively tries to manipulate 30 percent of his students into choosing the wrong answer." Sebastian goes on to list all the implications of this manufactured scandal.

As a student in this class, I found the first exam to be very straightforward in format. The 70 percent average was the result of varying amount of motivation in the students. Sebastian's references to "manipulative" and "misleading" exams sound like the lame excuses of an ill-prepared student.

There is a difference between constructive criticism about real issues and "crying wolf" on the Editorial page.

Utilize our resources

One of the major problems facing UMASS are the budget cuts. I do not want to see my fees in my last semester here go up any higher than there already are, and I do not want to hear about any more lay-offs in both staff and faculty. So, I propose a plan that we could adopt or even just consider.

Look how much land UMASS owns. Instead of sacrificing the quality of our education and jeopardizing jobs, why doesn't UMASS sell some of its land? There are a number of fraternities and sororities that would like to buy the land behind Orchard Hill (where P-Lot is located) and build houses for its members.

Also, we are not just talking about a couple of thousands of dollars from the sale, but a few hundred thousands of dollars. From what I hear, UMASS gets offers by national fraternities and sororities.

Imagine what UMASS could do with all this money. Also, UMASS would be utilizing all their resources and not just letting it lie there uselessly.

Fear fuels the legislators

Monday the Boston Globe released the survey results of 600 registered Massachusetts voters on the subject of a general tax increase — a hot topic on a campus that is on strike because it can tolerate no more cuts to its budget.

Meredith O'Brien

The response to the first question was very discouraging. Sixty percent of the voters said that they would not support new taxes to relieve the budget cutting.

This response is the only response that the legislators are using as their defense for not raising taxes. But this is only part of the survey, though they base their whole tax platform on it.

What many legislators refuse to acknowledge, however, are the responses to the rest of the survey questions:

Would your be more or less likely to accept a tax increase if you knew the resulting revenues would be earmarked for public education?

71 percent said they would be more likely to support it,
18 percent said they would be less likely to support it,
10 percent said they were indifferent,
3 percent said they did not know.

The voters were also in support of tax increases earmarked for human services — 67 percent, building/maintaining bridges and roads — 65 percent, health care — 72 percent, and local aid — 59 percent.

Notice that the majority of these randomly selected voters said that they would support a tax increase for specific uses.

If the legislators really wanted to help out higher education, they could vote to raise taxes specifically for that source — without fear of being voted out of office.

That's what this strike is all about, it's about fear.

The fear of the legislators that they will be out of a job if they wield to public pressure, going against what they believe is a public outcry not to raise taxes.

The fear of the students who might not be able to return to school next semester, might not be able to graduate, might be here extra semesters because they haven't gotten their classes.

The fear of the Teaching Assistants who may soon be out of jobs, or who may be forced to shoulder an extraordinary amount of work because their numbers are dwindling.

The fear of the faculty and staff that the reputation of UMass is being destroyed, now known as the "Budget Cut school," the school that pays little but expects that you will teach to 300 students in a small congested classroom and correct all of their exams by yourself.

Well, what are the legislators so afraid of?!

Massachusetts voters are not that stingy! They don't want the future of their state to be sheared off in an attempt to save the legislators' political necks!

Voters don't want to see the best and brightest of their state to flee to other states that offer them a more promising future.

But, realistically, no one wants to pay more taxes. I hate looking at my paychecks and seeing how much has been taken out due to federal and state taxes. But if it means that I will see more on my paycheck and less in my education, less in human services, less in health care, less in the roads and bridges that I drive on, the "savings" hardly seems worth it.

The people of Massachusetts know this. They will vote on it.

But I'm afraid that the frightened huddle of legislators who won't dare to say the "T" word, will soon be gone if they don't vote on it.

End the budget crisis

Massachusetts is losing it mind.

On Oct. 18, 15,000 students from state universities and colleges took that message to the Statehouse in what the Boston Globe called "the biggest demonstration since the Vietnam war." The rally was a ray of hope that growing public outrage may finally force the issue of education funding on the Legislature.

John Olver

Our legislature needs a good dose of outrage. According to a recent issue of the Chronicle of Higher Education, Massachusetts is the only state in the country that spends less money on higher education today than it did two years ago.

What a disgrace! At a time when 22 private schools in the state are charging more than $18,000/year, Massachusetts state colleges and universities are denying access to 9,000 students and slashing scholarships by more than $5 million.

This year, we've eliminated hundreds of teaching positions and closed thousands of classes. Our community colleges are turning away students for the first time in their history. We now spend less on library resources/student than any state in the country.

And we're not done yet. As this piece goes to print, the Legislature is considering another four percent reduction, $25 million cut, in the operating budget of all state campuses. Last week, this cut forced UMass Trustees to raise fees at Amherst by another $400 in the middle of this school year.

These cuts are both reckless and unprecedented. Since the advent of the modern land-grant universities, no state as wealthy as Massachusetts has cut its colleges and universities as deeply as we have this year.

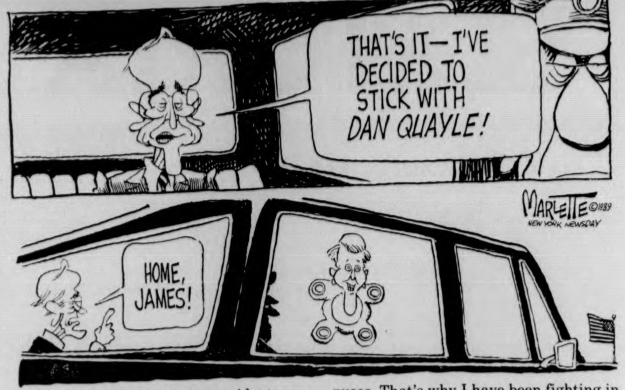
We've now cut higher education more than Iowa did during its farm crisis, more than Texas did during its oil recession, and more than Michigan did when their unemployment rate soared to 15 percent in the late 1970s and early 80s.

While the economy in Massachusetts may be slowing, we have seen nothing like the devastation that shook these states. Why is it that this wealthy state, with the third highest per capita income and one of the lowest unemployment rates in the country, feels it can not longer afford to educate its citizens?

In Massachusetts today, people work in oil and gas extraction and 142,000 work in education. Thirty people are engaged in coal mining and 83,000 work in banking. The forest industry employs 336 people, while 287,000 work in health professions.

What is going to pick up the slack in these knowledge-intensive industries when we have deserted our educational system? We can't return to the industries of yesteryear, nor would we want to return to their lower wages.

Some people think we don't need high-quality public colleges and universities because of our many fine private schools. but the vast majority of Harvard and MIT students leave the state upon graduation, while 70 percent of UMass graduates stay here.



THAT'S IT—I'VE DECIDED TO STICK WITH DAN QUAYLE!
HOME, JAMES!
MARLETTE ©1989 NEW YORK NEWSDAY

How many Massachusetts residents can afford the $20,000 price of the privates? But a year of high-quality college education is still under $6,000 at UMass-Amherst, including room and board.

Still, public education does not come cheaply. Over the last two decades, this state committed itself to building a higher education system that came within striking distance of the best in the country. Test scores of freshmen rose, research money flowed into the state, and minorities enrollments improved greatly.

But today, by dancing to the seductive tune of the "No new taxes" piper, the Legislature is turning its back on higher education, and our future economic health.

Unless we raise taxes, and soon, there's will be little hope for our struggling campuses. That's why I have been fighting in the Legislature for fair tax reform that will raise taxes on those not paying their share. It's also why I am now spending much of my time outside the Statehouse working for a ballot petition sponsored by the Tax Equity Alliance of Massachusetts.

The TEAM petition would raise over $300 million for education and other vital services, without costing the average taxpayer a dime. But just to get the question on the Nov. 1990 ballot, TEAM must collect nearly 100,000 signatures from registered voters.

Together, we can stop this madness. This wealthy state can afford a high-quality system of public higher education. And, frankly, we can't afford anything less.

ARTS & LIVING

Law's infringe on art's freedom of expression

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

"The freedom to think and express what we believe," the underlying message of the Bill of Rights, is ironically being ignored.

ART ATTACK

Especially in the arts has this quote not been upheld, or at least the government has gone out of its way to make sure of this. The most recent and tragic point is the Nov. 8 National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) financial divestment of $10,000 of an art show concerning AIDS that includes erotic images, and criticizes public figures. It was the first decision of its kind since the passage of a law this fall, restricting NEA or any government funding of art deemed "obscene."

A front page article ran in the New York Times exposing the incident, angering and frustrating thousands of East Coast artists. According to John E. Frohnmayer, the endowment's new chairman, he pulled the show's financing because it criticized public figures such as Roman Catholic Archbishop John Cardinal O'Connor, Senator Jesse Helms (R — North Carolina), a leader of the "fight against obscene art," and representative William Dannemeyer. Artists Space, the non-profit gallery where the exhibition was to be shown in May, received a letter from Frohnmayer stating, "Because of the recent criticism the endowment has come under, and the seriousness of Congress's directive, we must all work together to insure that projects funded by the Endowment do not violate either the spirit or the letter of the law." He also claimed that the decision to pull funding from the show was not based on the quality of the art, yet said, "Some of the [works] were in questionable taste."

Obviously the 23 photographers, painters and sculptors who created the project felt that these public figures politics about certain social and moral "dilemmas" were in questionable taste, otherwise, I'm sure they wouldn't have wasted precious art materials on them. What someone is overlooking is the possibility that they spoke out against them not to judge them harshly, but to criticize their authority figures, as should be the right of every citizen in the "free" world. When the Bill of Rights was constructed, this intent was wedged in. However, today this right seems to have been amended by setting upon it hurtful and needless limitations and restrictions.

With the nation progressively reverting to frightening and silly levels of homophobia as a response to AIDS and the continual stagnation of sex education in most of our schools, the arts is one of the few mediums left in which to educate and clarify stereotypes. I have not seen the exhibition, though witnesses have told me that is an important show with a strong message. The potential un-release of this show would be detrimental to the curious, the endless circles of art-lovers and to the Freedom of Speech act, not only to mention that it would be an even greater loss for the NEA and Artists Space. When talking about AIDS in any context, sex and sexuality will always be linked with it. The myth that AIDS is punishment against homosexuals was trampled in this exhibit. One may tend to forget, whether one is gay or straight, that AIDS does not discriminate.

As for the show being obscene, Nan Goldin, the show's curator, has pointed out that, "The show is not about sexuality, but about AIDS and how it has effected our community." How could a portrayal of real American life, or a different aspect thereof be rendered obscene?

In short, this kind of censorship cannot and will not be tolerated. It is an outward attack on art and if Congress succeeds in pushing its non-professional opinions on art, they'll push them on another issue for which they have no reason bothering. Don't let this happen — wake up!

Dance company looks at relations

If you're looking for something innovative and emotional, and you love dance, Bowker Auditorium is where you want to be tonight.

Performing there is the New York based choreographera Susan Marshall and her company of eight dancers at 8 p.m.

Since 1983, her company has performed in New York City theaters and has been touring since 1985. In that same year, she was awarded a New York Dance and Performance Award for Outstanding Choreographic Achievement.

The company will perform file works including Kiss (1987), Variations on Themes From Interior with Seven Figures (1989), and Arena (1986), just to name a few.

Her central subject matter deals with the complexities of intimate relationships, the barriers and hostilities that form even the best friendship, and the ups and downs of the sweetest romance.

Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center for $20 and $18, and Five College students are half price.

If you want to have an unconventional time and maybe learn something about yourself emotionally, Bowker Auditorium is the place to be.

Hastings: A man of an alien nature

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

The invasion has begun.

You want proof? Bring your human body down to the Campus Center Auditorium tonight at 8 p.m. and listen and watch as Robert Hastings, a UFO specialist, delivers a free lecture and and slide-tape program, "UFOs — The Hidden History." The event is sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Hastings is far from a fraud just trying to make it rich by scaring people about alien beings. All of his evidence comes from the United States Government.

In 1967, Hastings was part of a UFO sighting in an air traffic controller tower at Malmstrom Air Force Base in Montana. "Five UFOs were tracked on military radar," he said, "and for a half-hour period they hovered over nearby ICBM silos, violating sensitive air space. They then flew off at an estimated speed of 5,000 mph, far beyond the capability of any conventional aircraft."

When the government kept the story hush-hush, Hastings dedicated the rest of his life to uncovering government proof of UFO sightings.

"There's an abundance of hard evidence at this time of an ongoing cover-up," he said. "I believe the government's policies are very shortsighted to keep the public so totally in the dark regarding seemingly vital information that affects not only Americans, but the entire human race."

Under President Carter, the Freedom of Information Act enabled Hastings to obtain vast amounts of once classified items, including over 400 documents from the FBI. One of these involved J. Edgar Hoover. On an FBI memorandum dated March 22, 1950, Hoover reports an apparent Air Force discovery of three crashed UFOs in New Mexico. On board, they found "bodies of human shape, but only three feet tall." The vehicle crashed near a high-powered radar set-up, leading the Air Force to believe "the radar interferes with the controlling mechanisms of the saucers."

Under the Reagan and Bush administrations, information such as this is no longer available to the public. Hastings believes the government should reopen their files. "I guess you could say that I'm a political activist," said Hastings. "The intelligence community is the chief repository of information on UFOs, and I am taking a politicized approach to getting that information out in the open, challenging the ongoing problem of government secrecy."

Hastings is committed to his cause, and believes the discovery of other life forms will change the future. "Basically, I'm intensely committed to bringing the facts before the public," he said. "I believe we are on the threshold of an extremely exciting history of mankind. Only time will tell."

Dog paddling through life and art

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

As Roger Weingarten launched into his poetry, after a particularly gushing introduction by Debra Wyer of the UMass English department (including words as appropriate as "transcendental"), he stressed, through the simple beauty of his words, and his command over those words, the rightful place of poetry as one of the most important art forms known to man.

POETRY

Among the stand-outs of pieces Weingarten read were "Apples," "Surprise Party" and "Infant Bonds of Joy" ("The title poem of my next book."). A high point was his rendition of the ever topical poem "The Ayattola of 'I told you so's'," featuring a chorus of three. He finished the encoreless performance with "From the Temple of Longing," saying, "This is the poem I wanted to read last but I left the last page of it in Vermont, so I had to call a friend in Boston who read it to me. I guess that's a confession that I don't memorize my own work . . . I hope I can read my own writing." He could.

Only one thing went wrong, the tape recording of last Thursday night's UMass Poetry Society sponsored event didn't come out, just like last semester with Pinsky. Dondi Ahearn's photos didn't come out either (Weingarten's visible frustration was for nought). It would seem that, in some strange way, nothing technical was going to get in the way of the simplicity of poetry. Not here anyway.

Anyway, "I'm in a cheerful mood," Weingarten said, after the performance, setting me at ease.

Any advice for younger poets Mr. Weingarten?

"Well, I really have the reverse interest: do they have any advice for me? Your saying that the word dragonfly is a better one than butterfly [referring to an impish suggestion by Professor Wyer, after he used the prefix dragon instead of butter in a poem, throwing in a woops, for good measure], now there's some advice," he said. "But, going to [poetry] readings is always a good idea, reading the work of contemporary poets. I mean swimmers swim every day, and by the same token poets should read and write poetry frequently . . . well, poets are notoriously lazy, so I wouldn't say every day, but . . ."

And what about people who feel that MFA writing programs (such as the one that Weingarten teaches for at Vermont College) are, at best a waste of time, at worst the creator of machine-like writers devoid of all soul and passion?

"Well, it's not a new argument. I see it all as being a kind of apprenticeship, an extension of being an undergraduate writer. It's like the Rennaissance painters having apprentices. I also think that there's a lot of jealousy from the "I did it my way" (hard-knocks school of thought), where people are under the impression that they became instantaneously talented. Writing is like sculpting or building bridges. It's work as well as inspiration. Ideas are discussed and analyzed. [An MFA program] is just as valuable as going out on your own to make it. It may even provide a few short cuts."

What of the ever dwindling audience for poetry in today's world?

"Well, I remember in the 60s when seven people would show up to a poetry reading. I'm not in despair, but people could buy more slim volumes of poetry instead of electronics. There needs to be a repository of the literary arts of the future. If we don't read and support the arts of the future then the future will only be doomed because of our own stupidity."

And the generic "who are your literary influences" question?

"Well, not to be coy about it, but it's really hard to name specific poets, because I read a lot of people, but to go back to high school I'd definitely list Charles Baudelaire, Elizabeth Bishp, Sylvia Plath, Starbuck, Archilochus and Sapha. There's also a lot of fiction and drama in there, but the list is endless."

Anything else you'd like to add?

"If you're a painter, what inspires you is an incredible affinity to color and shape. What I'm doing isn't so different. I'm just dog paddling through language."

Other dog paddlers at this event were Joe Pernice and Rebecca Wolff, two student poets who were introduced by Weingarten at the outset of the reading. Pernice related some home spun tales concerning "Steak" and "The Oldest Prom Queens," injecting some warm humor into something that is, for no apparent reason, seen as being a droll and overly serious art form.

Wolff started her set with "Vision" with lines such as "punched eyes scrambling in the darkness," leaving the audience affected, to say the least.

She said later, "I've been writing since I was 12-years-old, and I'm UMass' only undergraduate poetry major,"(as a BDIC). She is also a regular at the Bonducci's open mike night. Pernice, whose obviously been influenced by minimalism, described himself as a "1990 English major."

Blues with a Hook

By RICHARD J. TOOMEY

John Lee Hooker
Pearl Street
Thursday, Nov. 9

The majority of the people who have recently been awakened to the music of John Lee Hooker have done so through his recent contribution to the Pete Townshend album, The Iron Man. But the 72 year old Hooker has been playing blues since before most of the exuberant capacity crowd was born.

REVIEW

The opening act, the Wildcat O'Halloran Band started the evening with a hard rock performance. They caught the enthusiasm of the crowd with the ballad "I Love the Woman." This led to the more upbeat "Walk Right In, Walk Right Out" and "Further On Down the Road," which further enticed the crowd.

Upon the closing of their set, several of the band members pulled up chairs in the upstairs DJ booth and awaited the great John Lee Hooker.

Hooker's band, the Kingsnakes (with Mike Osbourne) took the stage and made their presence felt as they played three originals.

They then introduced John Lee. He strutted onstage, wearing his oversized white hat, and immediately took a chair at center stage.

He started off with a rather tame set, but when he moved into some of his more famous songs, such as "Mabel" and "Boom Boom," the crowd was whipped into a frenzy.

The rest of the band carefully watched him perform, mainly because of the constant change in the songs' arrangements, but it also seemed that they were as impressed with him as the audience was.

During the traditional blues song "Face to Face," a young woman placed a pin on the Hook's coat. This minor event symbolized the crowd's enthusiasm for the man and his music.

Before ending, he strutted across the stage and performed his legendary boogie jam. During these final moments, he pointed to each member of the band as they performed their blistering solos.

He ended after only five songs, but made an encore appearance. As he walked about the stage singing and speaking to the mesmerized audience, Mike Osbourne played another solo in the John Lee vein.

Although his set was short, John Lee Hooker's musical vitality made for a tremendous evening. He proved to be an inspiration to both the Wildcat O'Halloran Band and the Kingsnakes. His music has become classic during his own lifetime.

A Diamond found in the ruff of Motley Bullets

I woke up this morning to discover that the heavy metal tooth fairy had left three albums beneath my pillow. An uneventful day was in store as I put on the new Bullet Lavolta album The Gift. The blandness and mediocrity of this overrated Boston quintet caused my pet octopus to request the playing of Iggy Pop or AC/DC songs they had ripped off. Yukki Gipe's annoying vocals are almost always unbearably unpleasant, similar to my roommate Tracey's tuna omlettes. The lyrics and music blend together incoherently, creating a mush which not even an infant craving a bottle of Gerber's could stomach. The production, or extreme lack of, is inexcusable and detrimental.

The next thing I popped into the stereo was the new Motley Crue LP. I had heard the title track, "Dr. Feelgood," blasted from stereos on campus and liked what I heard. That song, and the one after it called "Slice of Your Pie," are good, hook-filled pop rock hits ala 70s Aerosmith. Bob Rock's massive production can do no wrong. Unfortunately, the rest of the songs can do no good. The words are so banal it would be hard too see anyone but Crazy Johnny (the 14 year old dirt bike wizard) being able to relate to them. The lyrics are incredibly sexist and suggestive, enough so that I can see where the PMRC may have a point. Titles like "She Goes Down" and lines like "nineteen seductive ballerina, so trashy" fill this useless album.

Where Motley Crue and Bullet Lavolta failed miserably, King Diamond's latest album Conspiracy delivers. King Diamond and his band play a tight, melodic form of heavy metal full of constant tempo changes, funky rhythms and well thought out guitar solos. The music is best described as a hybrid of Megadeth and the theme from The Exorcist. King Diamond's vocals vary from an Iron Maiden-like soprano to occasional low Freddy Kruegerish grumbles. This fits in perfectly into the theme of the album, which is the second of concept albums based on Diamond's grandmother's dealings with invisible creatures from another world, and the spreading of their ideology through her tea. While this is completely silly, King Diamond knows it, and his sense of humor is well matched with his talented band to create an enjoyable work.

Suite is sweet

By HEATHER RONOVECH
Collegian Correspondent

When you think of Neil Simon, the plays Brighton Beach Memoirs and Biloxi Blues instantly come to mind. But Plaza Suite is also a Simon play. The production of this play, about three different couples in room 719 of the Plaza Hotel in New York by the University Players, was the best performance of the show I've seen, due to superb characterization and professionalism.

REVIEW

In the first act of the three act play, a middle-aged couple, Karen Nash (Lynn Steinberg) and her husband Sam (Zach Galvin) confront the problems in their marriage. Karen reserved room 719 at the Plaza because it was their 24th wedding anniversary, and that was their honeymoon suite. Sam, a workaholic, was not at all concerned with any anniversary celebrations, or with Karen. They argue about little things, but it was apparent there were more serious problems brewing below the surface.

Although she had a high-pitched voice and looked younger than she is, Lynn Steinberg was hilarious as Karen, and carried off the age difference well. The audience continually laughed at the little quirks of Karen's character. Steinberg gave the strongest performance out of the group.

Act II, called "A Visitor from Hollywood," starred Jeff Johnson as the slimy producer, Jesse Kiplinger, and newcomer Lori Wagner as the repressed Muriel Tate. Muriel was not happy with her suburban marriage, and secretly longs to be reunited with Jeese, whom she dated 17 years ago. Jesse had left New Jersey and gone off to Hollywood to become a rich and famous director, whose personal life was constantly covered in the gossip columns. He was obnoxious, and ostentatiously came on to Muriel. Jesse was so ridiculous that you had to laugh at him. Lori Wagner, as Muriel, also gave a commendable performance, acting at first very nervous, and then giving in to Jesse's advances.

"A Visitor From Forest Hills" is about two parents who have to get their daughter out of the bathroom of the hotel suite to have her wedding. Beth Salvi and Ian Guarnieri were excellent as the flustered mother and angry father (who paid $8000 for this elaborate wedding). Despite his short period of time onstage as Borden the groom, Andrew Schriever's, "Mimsey, cool it" was impressive.

In addition, newcomer Nicole Chiasson did a wonderful job directing the show.

resource director, echoed similar concerns about the loss of state aid.

"The town, like UMass, has to do more with less," she said.

Zolgar said the town has lost several positions, and has instituted a "semi-freeze" on hiring.

Amherst is hit especially hard because of the services it must supply to students who are not counted in the formula the state uses to distribute aid, she said.

"Several years ago, students were not included in the total. Then we petitioned the state to include them and now they are," she said. "But then a cap was placed on the increased aid so in essence the students aren't counted. It makes our job that much tougher."

Ron Bell, assistant superintendent of schools in Amherst, said the local school budget has been already cut.

"We began this fiscal year minus about $600,000 in the regional school system and short $400,000 in the local school budget," he said.

Amherst schools over the past few years have experienced a significant increase in student population, he said.

"With more students it makes maintaining educational services more difficult," he said. "We have maintained educational services but the support areas have been cut back significantly."

The school system has reduced teacher, custodial, and instructional aid as well as clerical positions, Bell said.

They have also deferred maintenance and renovation projects, he said.

"But we can only do this for a year or two before we create long-term problems," he said.

homosexuality.

The gay community has pulled together as a result of AIDS and has set a national precedent in caring for the sick, but the community still needs to come together to set goals for the future, he said.

"We need to define what are the common factors and denominators not what the differences are between gays, lesbians and bisexuals," he said.

Tierney said it is essential that the state remain at the "forefront of gay rights." One way to achieve this is to change state laws regarding sodomy and domestic partnership, he said.

Although sodomy is illegal in this state, the law is not enforced but that could change with more conservative state government, he said.

On the issue of domestic partnership, Tierney said he was not asking for legal homosexual marriage, but said the state should recognize a gay couple with the same economic rights as a married couple.

The gay community needs to provide more settings to meet other than bars and political gatherings so people will be able to "come in" to the homosexual community as opposed to "coming out" in the heterosexual community, Tierney said.

'Coming out' describes the process in terms of the heterosexual world; 'coming in' is a new order we've been working on for the past 20 years." he said.

The community's next goal will be to build a decade agenda for the 1900's that will include issues such as AIDS legislation, anti-violence acts and health care for gay couples, he said.

"We need to end the conspiracy of silence and understand the need for struggle if we want a choice about how we live our lives," he said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Being more aggressive will help land new business. A candid conversation with a co-worker bolsters your spirits. You develop a new strategy to solve a longtime problem.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Be on the lookout for bargains. Teamwork eases business pressures, letting you make headway with poet projects. Evening brings greater compatibility with someone close to you. Be tender.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Say what is on your mind if higher-ups seek your opinion. A power play could result in a startling change at work. Maintain your neutrality and you could come out on top.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Good luck prevails where property matters are concerned. Your hard work pays off. An attractive new acquaintance is dazzled by your lively personality. Take steps to consolidate recent gains.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Do not mix sentiment with business. Signing a contract is best postponed. Mixed trends indicate that an adviser has hidden motive. Travel gives you a new perspective on romance.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Tough business negotiations require a direct approach. Mate or partner is supportive. If single, you may find yourself embarking on an exciting new romance. Dress fashionably tonight.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Romance will have to take a backseat to business today. Feel free to experiment with new methods and procedures. Complete paperwork before leaving the office.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21): You receive a message today that could change the course of you career. Be true to your responsibilities. This is not a very good day for signing legal papers or contracts.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21): Do not let your personal feelings prevent you from doing what needs to be done. Joint financial problems should soon be resolved. Count on your income increasing in the near future.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan. 19): Valuable business contacts can be made at a meeting today. Learn how to delegate authority and your productivity will rise. Romance looks promising. Consult mate before planning a weekend outing.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): A fine day for enjoying fringe benefits related to your career. Try to go out to lunch with an old chum. It is possible that someone is having minor regrets about last night.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Do not try to force an issue. Your enterprising spirit will help you obtain financial backing. Visitors from afar are a source of happiness. A personal relationship intensifies.

UMass' shooting woes continued this half as they clanged in 11-34 shots. That was forgivable compared to its work from the charity stripe. The Minutewomen were 10-21 in the half and shot an atrocious 48 percent (13-27) for the game.

"I don't know," said Hewelt. "We generally shoot very well from the line."

Hoop notebook: UMass won the battle of the boards, 55-48 . . . Serafini cleaned the glass to the tune of 11 rebounds, a remarkable stat for a guard . . . The Minutewomen coughed up 20 turnovers . . . Freshman Ireland turned in a solid performance in her UMass debut. Her aggressive played earned her nine points, five rebounds and two steals in 17 minutes . . . Don't let Pytko's conservative point total (five points, 1-4 shooting) fool you. The senior pointguard rang up seven rebounds, four assists and three steals while being a soothing presence among her more jitterish teammates.

Anton Brown brought the ball up and threw up a desperation three-point shot which clanged off the back of the rim. Tate tipped in the rebound but time had already run out. Sodertajle wins 89-88.

"I think we are a better team this year," Calipari said. "We shot 50 percent in the first half. We only did that once all season last year."

The Minutemen had five guys scoring in double figures. McCoy had 18 points. Tate finished with 17 points and Rafer Giles threw in 12 points.

The biggest surprise came from the freshmen. Harper Williams had 14 points, 10 rebounds in 30 minutes. Barbee also had 14 points and grabbed seven rebounds of his own in 28 minutes. Both these men will make UMass basketball exciting in the future.

"I was pleased with their performance," Calipari said. "I think they proved that they can play in this league."

Calipari also praised the play of his starting guards. Cary Herer scored only three points but he played 19 quality minutes. "Cary will help us out a lot this year," Calipari said. "He is one of the gutsiest players I've seen."

McCoy proved that if he puts his mind to it, he can score every time down the floor.

"Jim McCoy can score at will," Calipari said. "He can be the best player in the league . . . if he wants to be."

Calipari also feels that his team has to make some adjustments to improve on defense. "We made a lot of defensive mistakes," Calipari said. "We made four of five mistakes on defense, that led directly to their scoring points. That's how we lost the game, defensive mistakes."

So what's left? Maybe ruin another team's playoff hopes?

"I don't think in terms of being a spoiler," Berry said. "We'll play to win, regardless of what's at stake."

"The emotion is there, but we're laying back and waiting for somebody else to make plays instead of making them ourselves," wide receiver Stanley Morgan said.

"Everyone on this team has pride and we want to go out and try to win some games," rookie wide receiver Hart Lee Dykes said. "We don't want to go out and just give away games."

That's what the Patriots did Sunday.

Three turnovers in less than three minutes led to three New Orleans touchdowns in a span of 8:41 in the second quarter. That made the score 28-0, and New England's two touchdowns in the last four minutes couldn't make up for 3½ quarters of failure.

"We were totally taken out of the game plan by the score and our poor field position," guard Sean Farrel said. "I'm confused about what went wrong."

The few things the Patriots did right on offense occurred because the Saints allowed them.

"This service rotation will get our strong hitters up front and give us better options for blocking," Ford said. "This way I can put Rachel Bredemeier in the middle with Sharon Panoff on the outside."

Outside hitter Julieta Santiago, one of the Minutewomen's top defenders, will be playing in her last collegiate match tonight. Santiago is the only senior the Minutwomen will be losing from what has basically been a rebuilding season.

Berry writing off this season for Pats

FOXBORO (AP) — New England Patriots coach Raymond Berry has given up on his team's playoff pursuit but not on his plan to build a championship team. He just has to adjust his timetable.

Sunday's 28-24 loss to New Orleans dropped the Patriots' record to 3-7, matching their loss total for all last season. It's the worst start since 1981 for a team that played in the 1986 Super Bowl.

"Coming into [Sunday's game] we needed 11 straight wins to win a championship and we lost," Berry said. "When you don't have a chance to go all the way, you have to regroup and refocus on what's realistic to work for.

"We are trying to develop a team to win a championship. You're working to build a winning team even when you're not in the chase. You have to build the nucleus over time."

It's a massive reconstruction job, but Berry can still draw the blueprints. He has a year left on his contract and, despite dwindling home attendance and his worst record in five full seasons as Patriots' coach, the support of owner Victor Kiam.

The Patriots, victimized by injuries and ineptitude, have a better record than only three teams — Dallas, Detroit, and the New York Jets. And they lost to the Jets the week before the setback to the Saints.

New England, while mathematically alive to make the NFL playoffs, trails Buffalo by four games and Miami by three in the AFC East with only six games left.

For the Patriots, its all over but the routing. Sunday, they face Buffalo, which already beat them 31-10.

It was all but over before the skinny coach sang, but Berry, the eternal optimist, finally sounded the last dirge for his out- of-tune team.

"I think we're out of it," he said Sunday. "That's the way it looks to me."

UMass rugby finishes up season

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts rugby club completed its fall season over the weekend not quite the way the team wanted to, losing 11-7 to Springfield College's rugby club at the lower Boyden field.

But there were more ups than downs this year for Francis Buttle's squad who finished up the season with a 14-11 mark, despite a relatively young team.

"We started the season with a squad of 70 players most of whom hadn't played before," Buttle said. "But they rapidly improved with game experience and dedication to practice."

The team put the points on the board, outscoring its opponents 238-188 during the season. But the defense had problems stopping its opponents.

"Our weakness had been defense," Buttle said. "We've allowed our opponents to score too many points against us. We must hit harder and tackle lower."

Still though, the senior side was able to win 3 of its 5 Intercollegiate contests, losing to Dartmouth College and Holy Cross.

Of the 70 members, 30 played on the senior side. Players like captain Kevin Turner, Rich Kendall, Gaetano Polizio, Mike Commerford, Bill McDonough and Tony Pirro provided the on-field leadership for the team.

Two weeks ago, against Amherst College, five players stepped into the senior side for the first time. Greg Champeau, Brian Donovan, Mike Colbert, Erich Kamm and Brian Nicole reached the first string.

"The future of the club looks good," Buttle said. "Next spring we have the nucleus of a very fine side and we shall expect to perform well in next year's Intercollegiate Championship. But we still need good players in all positions and will be recruiting next semester."

Buttle said that the success of the team during the season can be attributed to physical and abrasive forward play, support of the ball carrier, the general level of fitness and intensity, and the great leadership on the field.

The club finished the season over the .500 mark despite playing a very tough schedule which included a University of St. Andrews team from Scotland which went undefeated on its American tour.

Around the YanCon: For those who fried their gray matter after reading last week's notebook, fear not. All has become clear. Boston University obliged our sanity and lost to Connecticut Saturday, 38-30, thus backing Maine into the title. Maine barely beat Northeastern, 29-26. New Hampshire dumped Rhode Island, 25-0, and Delaware topped Richmond, 33-17.

Yogi-ism of the Week: "Has Northeastern won since they last won?" — uttered by a Collegian football writer, who wishes to remain anonymous for obvious reasons.

Volleyball to wrap long season up

Minutewomen, 2-26, host Huskies tonight

By CHRIS MIRACLE

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team will finish up its season tonight at Totman Gymnasium, 7 p.m.

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team (2-23) hopes to finish on an upbeat note in their final match of the season as they try to attain victory against Northeastern University at Totman Gym tonight, at 7 p.m.

That is if the Northeastern players pass measles tests that they took yesterday because of a breakout on the Northeastern campus. If enough players do not pass the test the match will be canceled.

The Huskies (18-7), an independent team, coming in on a nine-game winning streak, may cause some problems for the Minutewomen. Maria Armellino and Chris Freren, who lead their team in kills with a 2.9 and 2.4 kill average, respectively, are two reasons why the Huskies have most likely qualified for the ECAC tournament.

"Northeastern is a good match to finish our season with. They're an older team with more experience," UMass coach Carol Ford said."Our goal is to go out and play as well as we can."

Only practicing two days after their loss to Central Connecticut, the Minutewomen (idle this past weekend as were the Huskies) have been working on a new line-up and hope three days of practice are enough to make it work.

Mitchell breaks UM receiving mark

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Saturday's 29-26 loss to Villanova University turned out to be a bitter-sweet one for Chip Mitchell.

The senior split end from Willingboro, N.J. surpassed the UMass record for career receiving yards with his final catch of the game.

"But I wish we could have won," Mitchell said.

With his nine-catch, 134-yard performance, Mitchell now has 1,590 total yards receiving for his career, besting the old mark of 1,571 held by Bob Simeone ('85).

"That was one of our minor goals," UMass coach Jim Reid said of Mitchell's record-breaker.

For the record, the key catch came with the Minutemen on their final drive, attempting to either tie or win. Mitchell cut down and out on the left side and hauled in a clutch 22-yard pass from substitute quarterback Paul Tornatore. The pass came on fourth down and momentarily kept the UMass hopes alive.

With his nine catches, Mitchell now has 100 for his career, which puts him within reach of that all-time UMass mark. Simeone's 108 receptions tops the list in that category, and Mitchell has one more shot to beat that when the Minutemen host New Hampshire in the season finale Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The fact that Mitchell is even close to any records is a tribute to his talent. He has only been a receiver for two years, having been switched to split end for the final game of the 1987 season. Mitchell started his career as a tailback.

Honor roll: Junior flanker Mike Tobin may be one of the leading receivers for the Minutemen, but he ain't too shabby with the books, either. The walk-on from Concord, who is a history major, was named an Academic All-American at wide receiver for District I (New England), and is a candidate for national honors.

On the athletic side, you probably can't debate the fact that UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos is a leading candidate for top Yankee Conference newcomer.

For the fourth time in his six weeks as a starter, Wilkos was named YC Rookie-of-the-Week for his performance against Villanova. For the second straight week, Wilkos achieved a 'double-triple' (100 yards passing and rushing) with 152 yards on the ground and 146 more through the air in just over three quarters of play.

Wilkos, who passed the 100-yard rushing point on the first play of the second quarter, also scored three touchdowns, which is the most by a UM quarterback in at least 20 years.

Also, linebacker Matt Tulley was rightly named to the YanCon weekly honor roll after his outing in which he had three sacks and a key interception.

Update from the local M*A*S*H unit: Jerome Bledsoe recovered from his pulled quadricep, and then took back-to-back shots to his left knee. He is out of this weekend's game. Defensive tackle John Creamer is doubtful with an ankle injury.

Water polo finishes 5th at Easterns

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team competed in the Eastern Championships over the past weekend. The Minutemen won two of their three games, and came home with a fifth place finish. The national top-20 poll has not been released yet, but UMass coach Russ Yarworth expects to be on the list.

"We've developed a pretty good program here," said Yarworth. "The national rankings will be released at the end of the day, but I'd imagine we'll get a top 20 ranking. I don't know if it will be 18, 19 or 20, but I will be pleased with that."

In the opening round, the Minutemen got the short end of the stick. They were forced to play top ranked Arkansas-Little Rock. UMass took a sound thumpin, losing 16-4.

"I wasn't pleased with the way we played," said Yarworth. "We were overmatched talent wise, but we just didn't attack the game aggressivly."

Arkansas-Little Rock went on to become the tournament champs. In the next round of the double elimination tourney, the Minutemen had a grueling come from behind overtime victory against Iona, 7-6.

The scoring went back and forth all afternoon. Iona jumped out to a quick 2-0 lead. UMass battled back to tie it up, but Iona regrouped and pulled ahead. UMass picked up the pace, and at the end of regulation, the score was tied at six a piece, thanks to the play of John Miller. The Minutemen won it in overtime, as Matt Buckley netted the winning goal with nine seconds left. Miller was the reason the Minutemen won, as he scored five of the team's seven goals.

"John Miller was incredible in that game," said Yarworth. "I think he should make first team, all East."

That victory pitted UMass against Slippery Rock, the winner to take fifth place. Again, the Minutemen went down early, as Slippery Rock took a 3-0 lead. UMass came back slow, and tied the game 3-3 by halftime. The game was decided by a Scott Delucus goal with 17 seconds left on the clock. Slippery Rock tried to make a last second play, but goalie Todd Larson saved the game.

"We had a goal at the beginning of the season to qualify for the Easterns, then make it to the top five, and that's what we did," said Yarworth. "I'm really pleased with that. It was a real satisfying season."

Basketball teams entertain foriegn talent at Cage

• Men fall to Sodertajle, 89-88

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team opened its season Saturday night, dropping an exhibition game against the Sodertajle BBK team from Sweden at the Curry Hicks Cage. The Minutemen led throughout most of the game. But Sodertajle walked away with the one point, 89-88 victory.

UMass coach John Calipari has two freshmen in his starting lineup again this year. Tony Barbee and Harper Williams started in the forward spots. Veterans John Tate was at center while Jim McCoy and Cary Herer comprised the backcourt.

"I came in here looking for three things," Calipari said. "One, I wanted to see how the team stood as a whole. Two, where the returning players stood, in terms of improvement, and three, where the freshmen, Barbee and Williams stood."

The Minutemen came out of the gate fast and dominated early. Sodertajle couldn't even buy a basket from the inside, and was forced to depend on their outside shot to stay in the game. Five of their first 13 first shots were from behind the three-point line. Meanwhile, McCoy, who virtually scored at will all night, and Rafer Giles, eight first half points, helped keep UMass ahead.

The Minutemen went into the locker room at halftime with a nine point lead, 50-41. UMass shot 50 percent from the floor, hitting 22 of 44 shots. Sodertajle on the other hand, shot 46 percent, 13 of 28.

In the second half, the Minutemen's play was sporatic. The lead ballooned to 15 points with fifteen minutes to go. But, it was cut down to six points ten minutes later.

Sodertajle tied the game at 77 with a three-point shot by Peter Mellstrom with about four minutes to go.

The lead changed hands several times over the next two minutes. With about 1:25 left, down by one, the Minutemen went to Williams. He missed the shot but was fouled on the play. Williams must have nerves of steel because the situation had no effect on him at all. He hit both clutch free throws, putting his team ahead, 88-87.

Sodertajle brought the ball down to the right corner of the court. As McCoy was going for the steal, he was nailed with a reaching foul with eight seconds left. Sweden hit both shots and led 89-88.

• Women whip Amager, 67-54

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The pregame yell in the huddle for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team was "One, two, three, . . . win."

That could well sum up its effort Saturday night against the BK Amager team from Denmark at the Curry Hicks Cage, where UMass won an exhibition game, 67-54. The team didn't do anything spectacular and at times looked a little ragged but managed to do what it took to win.

The Minutewomen were led by senior center Helen Freeman's 17 points and four blocked shots and senior Sue Serafini's 14 points, 11 rebounds and five assists.

"I'm not pleased," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. "We certainly have a lot of work to do."

Freeman dropped in the first hoop of the season, a post up turnaround jumper in the lane. From there, UMass posted leads of 16-9 on a Lisa Ireland (nine points) power post up spin move and 20-11 when co-captain Keyburn McCusker (seven points, 11 rebounds) got a top of the key jumper to fall.

Despite the halftime lead, UMass' play was at times less than desirable. The Minutewomen missed many shots from close range and finished the half, shooting 11-36. Denmark followed the lead of their hosts and chucked up enough bricks to finish the half shooting 9-27.

"We're very young," said Hewelt. "When we play well we're outstanding. When we don't play well, we look very bad. The more they play together, the better they'll get."

In the second half with Denmark trailing by only one, Serafini turned in a five minute explosion that helped put away the Amager team. First, she hit a spot up three-pointer to make it 36-32. The next trip down she delivered a pretty underhand shovel pass to Freeman for a hoop. Finally, she put back a missed Lisa Hair free throw for a 45-36 lead.

If Serafini's spurt didn't finish Denmark then Michele Pytko probably did.

With Denmark still hanging around, trailing by only nine points, Pytko made two defensive gems that prevented potential big plays for Amager. With 4:49 left, she stripped Tanya Hansen to prevent the birth of a two-on-one break. Less than a minute later she blocked Lisbeth Feldbvoss on a fast break lay-up to create a held ball call.

Voter registration drive kicks off

1,000 register on Campus Center Concourse

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

About 1,000 University of Massachusetts students registered to vote yesterday, marking the first of the three-day voter registration drive on the Campus Center Concourse.

Registering to vote is the first step in convincing legislators to change their priorities and vote for new taxes, said Mari Mignosa, a UMass senior who registered in Dracut.

"I don't think legislators want to hear from non-voters," she said. "They help people who can keep them in their places of power."

Michael Donovan, one of five non-traditional students who organized the registration drive, said he believes students are eager to register because they realize that their votes do make a difference.

Many students are concerned about the future quality of their education at UMass, and want to stop state budget cuts to higher education, he said.

"This [preparing to vote] is more powerful than any rally or any strike," Donovan said. "The only way you can really affect the system is to vote. It is the most powerful tool we have as individuals."

Kyle Frazier, a freshman, said students must not only register to vote but must consistently lobby their legislators to vote for new taxes.

"Students have no money to lobby the Statehouse, but we have large numbers in our favor,"he said.

Richard Formato, a senior who is scheduled to graduate this May, said he may have to drop out of school if fees increase next semester.

"I might not be able to make it back next semester if fees increase by $400," said Formato, a mechanical engineering major. "It's scary. I have a 3.5 average and I might be heading home and working at Dunkin' Donuts."

Formato said he was going directly to the Newman Center to call his state representative.

At 3 p.m., the Newman Center phone bank had recorded 68 signatures of people who had contacted their representatives. Six telephones were being used and 15 people were waiting in line.

Dix McComas, a teaching assistant in the English department, said he will ask his class today if they want to use class time to make calls to their representatives at the Newman Center.

Voter registration is scheduled for today and tomorrow from 9 a.m. The Neman Center phone bank is open all week from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Rape reported in UMass dorm

A female student at the University of Massachusetts was raped yesterday between 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. in a residence hall on campus, police said.

The woman received medical attention and reported the incident to police. The Civil Disorders Unit responded and met with the victim, said Arthur Hilson, director of public safety.

"It appears to have been acquaintance rape," Hilson said.

Police said the woman was prepared to press charges against the assailant. The police said they planned to expedite the charges last night.

"We plan to move through the system as fast as possible," Hilson said.

The exact location of the rape could not be disclosed at this time, Hilson said.

Day 2: strikers urge unity

Hundreds rally to maintain momentum

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

A sea of about 1,500 student strikers flowed across campus yesterday, stopping several times to make speeches and gather more people into their ranks following a morning rally at the Student Union steps.

The rally, which lasted for more than two hours, called for student unity to fight against budget cuts and to "Shut this place down," student Mark Viesta said. Strikers yelled to passersby, "Hey — we're doing this for you. Don't you care?"

Strikers left the Student Union and marched past Marcus, Marston, and Holdsworth halls yelling "Join us." At noon, marchers blocked traffic on both sides of Massachusetts Ave. for about five minutes while they crossed the street heading toward the Southwest Residential Area.

Drivers repeatedly honked their horns in response to a sign which read "Honk for Strike."

Strikers' cheers, "Students United — Will never be defeated" echoed between the buildings as they entered the area. The group gathered on and around both pyramids, shouting and waving placards.

Student Rudy Krigger shouted through a megaphone,"Go home, look around and you will see that some of us won't be able to come back next year. It's a simple hard core fact. That's why we have to gather in strength in opposing these stupid cuts."

Viesta told the crowd that when he looked at himself in the mirror earlier that morning, he thought to himself, "What am I doing? I've never been on strike before.

"What if [the strike] does go over? What if we strike to the hearts of the politicians who are not representing us

Grad students vote to strike; will boycott classes until Friday

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

About 250 graduate students voted overwhelmingly at last night's Graduate Student Senate meeting to formally join the student strike and boycott classes today, tomorrow and Friday to protest state budget cuts to higher education.

Catalina Castillon Dodson, president of the Graduate Student Senate, said graduate students are concerned about next semester's $430 proposed fee increase and a bill in the Legislature that may cut the state "03"account by 20 percent. The "03" accounts finance teaching assistantships.

"For the next three days our strength will be spent lobbying in Boston, picketing and making telephone calls," she said.

She said she is impressed by the organization of the undergraduate strikers.

John Zicconi, an undergraduate strike organizer, told the graduate students before the vote that the strike had lost some momentum yesterday.

"If we could keep up a week [picketing] strongly we could send a really good message to Boston," he said. "If you could help us in any kind of way we would appreciate it."

John Cole, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said most faculty probably would not support the strike if it goes into next week. The strike organizers should consider declaring a victory at the end of the week and end the strike, he said.

> "Students have learned serious lessons on how to organize on this campus. The strike should end while it has good strength and the energy should be used to work on lobbying the Legislature."
> – MSP President John Cole

"The Legislature is in total chaos and there is nothing we can do to speed stuff up," he said. "Students have learned serious lessons on how to organize on this campus. The strike should end while it has good strength and the energy should be used to work on lobbying the Legislature."

He said The Boston Globe's coverage of the strike was positive yesterday. A Globe editorial yesterday mentioned and approved of the students' actions.

"For the people who don't approve of the strike I respond, When was the last time UMass was on the front of the Globe?" he said.

John Dunlap, speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate and a strike organizer, said there is no specific request that the Legislature could meet to satisfy the strikers. The strike organizers want a committment from the Legislature to stop cutting the higher education and social services budgets, he said.

"The duration of the strike is open-ended and is being evaluated on an ongoing basis," he said.

Robert Fadel, student attorney general and an undergraduate strike organizer, said he is happy to hear that the graduates support the strike.

"Graduate students represent a significant part of the academic community," he said. "By them joining the strike it further accelerates the movement."

The Graduate Employees Organization membership is scheduled to vote a work stoppage for Thursday and Friday. There are 1,400 teaching assistants and about 850 belong to the organization, said Renee Heberle, co-spokesperson for the GEO.

Fadel said the undergraduate organizers are eagerly awaiting their decision.

"Every person recognizes how heavily the University revolves around teaching assistants," he said. "The GEO endorsing the strike will be one of the final steps in shutting down the University."

Olver: Mass. ranks last in education spending

State Sen. John Olver

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

State Sen. John Olver, (D-Amherst), told some 100 people at the University of Massachusetts last night that Massachusetts is the only state in the nation which has appropriated fewer dollars for public higher education over the last two years.

Olver, speaking at a teach-in in the Student Union Ballroom, said Massachusetts appropriations for public higher education had increased for eight consecutive years until two years ago.

But, he added, "Over the past two years, we're dead last."

"We were first for public higher education and now we've dropped all the way to 50," Olver said.

He said the tuition and fee increases that UMass is currently facing will limit educational access for economically disadvantaged students.

"This means that people with higher incomes will be able to afford education and people with lower incomes will find themselves squeezed out of a very important opportunity for education," he said.

Massachusetts has a low unemployment rate and is ranked third highest in the country for per capita income, he said.

"No state in the last 50 years has cut in the way Massachusetts is cutting now," Olver said. "No state has done this in the prosperity that Massachusetts is enjoying right now."

"Unless we get the money that has been cut put back into the coffer, we are going to see destruction of the whole slot of state programs," Olver said, adding that human services programs that benefit the most citizens, including education, will be the hardest hit.

He said faculty salaries and reasearch programs which have fared well in the past may now be in jeopardy.

He said there has to be a common support for the University from the students, their parents and alumni who compose a huge system that has never been mobilized, he said.

The legislators need to feel a persistent electoral pressure if they are to raise taxes.

"Legislators will try to avoid increasing taxes until the last possible moment," Olver said. "They fear election retribution greater than an organized outrage about the loss of education."

Bikers meet Duke in Boston

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

The first thing Greg Swinand did after arriving at the Statehouse at 2:50 p.m. Monday after a 100-mile bike ride was to try and speak to Gov. Dukakis about budget cuts to public higher education.

But after a ride he described as "long but inspirational," the University of Massachusetts senior was denied entrance.

After the attempt, Swinand rejoined the five other UMass Cycling Team members who made the trip outside the Statehouse to plan a new strategy, Swinand said.

The cyclists were standing on the main steps when they saw Dukakis climbing an adjacent staircase, Swinand said. Kim Morris, a team member yelled out, "Hey Governor!"

"Dukakis waved to us, but it was obvious that he was going to keep going," Swinand said.

But when Morris yelled out, "We've ridden 100 miles to see you!", the governor approached the group.

Swinand said he told Dukakis that cuts to state education were unfair, to which he said the governor agreed.

"The governor said he supported the need for high quality public education and that the future of the state depends on it," Swinand said.

Swinand said Dukakis told the group that what the state really needs are the two Ts — tuition and taxes.

Swinand met with his legislators, Sen. Thomas P. White, (D-Worcester), and Rep. Peter Blute, (R-Shrewsbury).

Swinand said that White, a UMass graduate, said he would support a one percent sale tax earmarked for higher education.

Blute said he did not favor new taxes, but thought cuts should not be made to UMass, Swinand said.

Swinand said, "The trip opened my eyes to the real political climate."

"I wanted to do something positive to bring attention to the crisis here. I think the strike may have possibly been seen in a negative light," he said.

Prof: media is crucial to strikes

By LISA MILLEGAN
Collegian Correspondent

The media's perception of an event is often more important than the event itself, said communication Professor Sut Jhally at a teach-in Monday in the Student Union Ballroom.

Jhally spoke to a group of some 800 students about the media's coverage of student strikes. He focused on the ongoing student strike at the University.

"Battles such as UMass' student strike are won in the perceptions of the wider community," he said.

Jhally illustrated the powerful role the media plays in progressive movements by using as an example the media's coverage of the Oct. 18 student rally in Boston to protest budget cuts.

He said the reason the Boston rally was given such poor coverage stemmed from the fact that few reporters were sent to cover it.

The reporters instead focused on the earthquake in San Francisco as the major news item, he said.

The reporters that did attend the rally spent a limited time there and immediately focused their attention on the rally's problems, he said.

In order for progressive groups to be correctly represented by the media, Jhally said they should be organized and have informed leaders and spokespersons.

Also, he said groups who have good public relations networks and are able to provide reporters with easy access to accurate information.

Reps to debate funding

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Debate over a proposed amendment to exempt funding for graduate students, part-time student employees and part-time faculty from cuts to "03" accounts is scheduled to begin today in the House.

State representatives met yesterday at the Statehouse to discuss public higher education and other issues.

"The O'Leary Amendment attempts to alter the wording in the bill to exclude graduate students, part-time student employees and faculty, and those who are paid by grants from under this '03' account heading," state Rep. Stan Rosenberg said.

The O'Leary Amendment is sponsored by Rep. Tim O'Leary (D. Melrose).

The difference between the O'Leary amendment and the Rosenberg Amendment, which is also pending in support of public higher education, is that the latter advocates not only an attempt to alter the wording but also to exclude direct-care staff in the UMass Medical Center from being hit, Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg explained that the two amendments are not at odds with each other but are working together.

"It has not been debated, it is still pending," he said of his amendment. "We'll continue to negotiate with the leaders of the House on all of these issues that effect higher education."

Rosenberg said the legislators did not discuss the student strike at UMass but urged students to continue their efforts.

"I just want to say that the lobbying on Boston is clearly having a positive effect. It is definitely catching the Legislator's attention," he said. "It will continue to build a positive momentum.

"But it is important to pace yourselves, this is only one fight in a very long battle. People who think this will be over in January should re-think it," Rosenberg said.

Environmental group seeks help

By WILLIAM FLEISHMAN
Collegian Staff

Members of the western Massachusetts Clean Water Action Committee are urging students concerned about the environment to work to improve the current situation.

Chris Bathurst, local program director, said, "We're really hoping that student activists will come by our office and see how they really can make a difference."

Last month, the group set up an "Environmental Shopper's Campaign" at the Stop and Shop supermarket in Hadley. The event was designed to push for production of more recyclable food packages and to warn consumers about dangerous pesticides used on fruits and vegetables.

"These pesticides haven't been tested for long term effects," he said. "We're pushing for changes."

Bathurst said the organization has been successful in the past by putting pressure on legislators to vote for bills concerning other environmental issues.

One of the organization's accomplishments is the cleaning up of the Connecticut River to restore safe swimming and fishing, he said.

The group also prevented the diverting of the river to the Quabbin Reservoir, which he said would not only pollute the drinking water, but also would introduce dangerous parasites that would be fatal to the fish life.

Clean Water Action is a national environmental organization. There are more than 500,000 members spanning its 25 offices across the country. The Amherst chapter is one of the three located in New England. The other two are situated in Boston and Rhode Island.

as registered voters. What if we do shut this college down?" he said.

After the group marched to Haigis Mall, organizers spoke from the Fine Arts Center walkway to a crowd of about 2,000 people.

Krigger's speech was met with clapping and cheering as he said, "Did they think we would sit back and be robbed of our education. Obviously they were wrong. If there's anybody who didn't believe this would work then look behind you."

Dave Mitchell, a University-employed electrician, told strikers that employees support the strike, but fear losing their jobs if they violated their contracts and joined the effort.

"I urge all workers, from [Chancellor] Joe Duffey to every dishwasher, to join the strike in one way or another," Mitchell said. "You're not studying history. You are making it."

Bridget Biltz, an American Studies major at Mount Holyoke College who is taking two courses at UMass this semester, said she feels a part of the strike and wants to inform the students at her own school.

"I'm a Five College student and I want you to know that the Valley is with you," Biltz said.

UMass students were joined in their actions yesterday by non-enrolled people fighting for their educational futures and those of family members.

Carolyn Martin and her husband plan to enroll in UMass as students next fall and may not be able to attend if tuition and fees are raised.

Are they listening in the State House?

Reps. talk about cuts and strike

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

This week, while cries against budget cuts are echoing throughout campus amid the student strike, state legislators are 100 miles away at the state's captial, debating a $400 million savings plan which threatens to cut away at state programs, including public higher education.

The question many are asking is: are the students' efforts to fight the budget cuts having an effect outside Amherst and what message are these efforts sending?

State legislators have heard the voice of the students, according to Rep. Nick Paleologos, (D-Woburn), chairman of the committee of education, art and humanities.

"I think the year of 1989 will be looked back on as the year students woke up and stood up for their education," Paleologos said. "If nothing else, it sent the message from the students that these cuts hurt and the legislators know that."

Paleologos said he fully supports the student strike and said his "heart is in Amherst.

"If I weren't here in Boston, I would be picketing right there with the students in Amherst," he said.

Paleologos said the strike is as effective as any other means for students to send a message to their legislators.

"In the short run, students have sent out a message that they are effected by these cuts. This is something the legislators needed to know and the public needed to know as well," he said. "In the long run, the message should be positive as well, but that remains to be seen."

> "Don't demand of us. You can't threaten us. Threats don't work. The student strike is a lot of sound and fury signifying nothing.
> –Rep. Chester Suhuski (D-Gardner)

Students depict a gruesome future for education

Strike "way off base."

Some legislators such as Rep. Chester Suhoski (D-Gardner), however, do not agree with the tactics of a student strike.

Suhoski who is a graduate of the University, said student demonstrations are positive actions, but that the strategy of going on strike at UMass is "way off base."

"The massive student rally [at the Statehouse] was terrific,"Suhoski said.

But, he said, "Speaking for a moment as a parent, I would be mad, even if I agreed with him in principle, if my son went on strike because I feel it would be disruptive to him and his education."

Suhoski went on to say that the student strike will have little effect on swaying state legislators' votes.

"I am on your side," Suhoski said. "But, I think if other legislators were in support of funding public higher education, this [the student strike] would annoy them."

He said demands are not the way to convince the legislature to prioritize public higher education.

"Don't demand of us. You can't threaten us. Threats don't work. The student strike is a lot of sound and fury signifying nothing," Suhoski said.

Even the dogs are on strike

Suhoski suggested that students rise up to the "challenge" and find "innovative ways to get message out".

> "If I weren't here in Boston, I would be picketing right there with the students in Amherst."
> –Rep. Nick Paleologos (D-Woburn)

"Public higher education is vital to the survival of the state. We need to put a greater emphasis on education," Suhoski said.

"It is more difficult to convince 200 legislators how to value public higher education than to just go on strike. Students need to marshal their forces and ideas in a more constructive way," he said.

Strike is a "constructive" action

Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst), said the student strike is a valid means of protest as long as it is "productive and generates political action."

"So far, the strike has been very constructive. All tactics the campus has been undertaking have been making it very difficult for the legislature to ignore," Rosenberg said.

Although Rosenberg said the students' efforts to reinstate their budget has received the attention of many legislators, at this point in time many of the representatives are preoccupied with balancing the state budget.

"Legislators are so caught up in the savings plan debate, they are not noticing the student strike as much as they could be," Rosenberg said.

"The voice of the students continues to be heard in the legislature," he added. "The leaders of the strike need to be careful and decide when the tactics of the strike have run its course."

Breaking down the barriers

Lisa Nelson, a coordinator of the student strike, feels that many positive things have come out of this action.

"We've banded together and shown that we can work as a group," Nelson said. "We are breaking down barriers at an amazing rate. Hopefully we'll be able to keep them down once this is over."

Nelson feels that the student movement at the University has generated a higher public awareness about the plight of the students and faculty fighting for public higher education.

"People have called me and expressed their support from all around," she said. "We don't look like a bunch of lunatics to the public. We are responding to the situation."

Bruce Laurie, professor of history at UMass, said the strike, which he prefers to call a boycott because it carries less negative connatations, will have an impact on the legislature although it might not be noticeable immediately.

"The immediate impact of the strike called to attention the conditions on this campus. More and more legislators know about the situation here now," Laurie said. "The boycott brought the sacrifices students had to make to public attention.

"I think that the cumulative impact [of the student protests] will be favorable,"he said.

Nelson said she knows that the efforts of the students are having an effect on the state legislature, but "I just hope we are not too late."

Support Gay Rights Bill

We at the Collegian support today's passage of the Gay Rights Bill as an acknowledgment of basic human rights.

We believe all people have the right to express their sexual orientation: whether that orientation is part of the human condition, like race and gender; or a personal choice, like freedom of speech and religion.

It is only proper for the Commonwealth to declare sexual orientation (be that bisexual, heterosexual or homosexual) as an illegal basis for discrimination in areas of employment, housing or the granting of loans.

Just as our society loses by excluding women, people of color and others, it also loses by excluding people of different sexual orientations.

While the law is a necessary first step in the protection of human rights, we know that bigotry accounts for the majority of civil rights' violations.

We ask that you take the law to heart.

What STRIKE thing?

I dropped by the Jugglers convention last weekend to catch part of a free show in the Campus Center auditorium, and talked to a guy named Ed Eckel, an Astronomy and Physics major.

He figured out right away that I might know something about this whole STRIKE thing, so we got a little heavy dialogue going, as heavy as you can get when people are flinging bowling pins at each other from on top of unicycles.

Al Arpad

Ed said that the technical people from his end of campus are kind of nervous about the whole STRIKE thing, especially because their classes are a lot harder than ours, and the professors are kind of inclined to flunk people. He has a point.

Ed also said a lot of people with technical majors are very practical thinkers, and they wonder why anybody in Boston would care whether or not we go to classes, and he has another point.

So far, the Boston Globe has kept us back around page 21, although we did get next to Mike Barnicle on Tuesday.

In fact, this whole STRIKE thing is in danger of fizzling. It just doesn't have the hard driving durability of the average UMass weekend party marathon. Something has to be done, because if this whole STRIKE thing goes down the tubes, I won't be back next semester. I just don't have the extra $500.

Ed Eckel suggested that people with technical majors might respond well to a practical challenge, like a $500 prize for the best way to improve energy efficiency on campus.

I don't have $500 (see above), but if somebody has practical, positive suggestions for saving money, they would be very helpful right now. If you don't know where to send them, send them to me and I'll figure out where they should go, and notify the media.

You could probably get on page 21 of the Globe.

Meanwhile, this whole STRIKE thing has to diversify. We can't just stand around for days and days saying "education is a right" and expect people to be impressed. I've heard a couple of suggestions:

[bullet] We could collect pennies from everybody on campus, maybe even coordinate it with other schools, and dump a whole truckload on the Statehouse steps.

[bullet] We could build a bunch of shacks, like Cutback City from last year, except this time do it on the Boston Common and call it the University of the Future, or something like that. It would need a lot of people and some prior planning, or else the cops might interfere, but it could be done.

There will probably be another rally at the Student Union tomorrow, so if you want to help or if you have any better ideas, get radical and show up.

Whatever you do, though, don't show up for anything like an unauthorized BONFIRE TOMORROW NIGHT AT 9 O'CLOCK BY THE POND.

Sure, it would be fun, but that would be going too far. We don't want the newspapers to think that we're really mad about this whole BUDGET thing, right?

Remember how terrible it was being in the Globe every day for two weeks, just because we stomped some flowers at the Statehouse? We don't want that to happen again, right?

Right?

Strikers taking the wrong approach

Why strike?

All students are affected by the State's budget cuts. How does the act of cutting classes show the state government that they should not cut the higher education budget? What is the purpose?

We're not saying that the fight to stop cuts is wrong, we all have the same goal. But who is benefitting from the boycott of classes? Surely not the students. We have already paid for this semester, so why deprive ourselves from the education we deserve?

As for the faculty, there seems to be a severe split down the middle. If this strike were to work, we would need 100 percent of their support. Obviously, the other half that disapproves is still holding classes — realize the stupidity of this strike.

For all those strikers, you have no right to ask your professor to put off homework, papers or exams. If you are striking, realize that in order to get something, you've got to give something up. In your case, that's learning time that you've already paid for. This will only make UMass look ridiculous. It may have worked for NYU but they have a different state system.

Monday, the Boston Globe had an article about Massachusetts voters and the tax hikes. "60 percent surveyed said they are more likely to support tax hikes earmarked for education." If we don't cut from higher education, where will the funds come from? The handicapped, elderly, lower education?

Come on kids, give the strike up. Ban together and bug the legislators, not the dedicated students trying to cross the picket line. Personally, we have harassed enough. Let us go to our goddamn classes! If you are going to strike, do it on the weekend. Give up footbgall and drinking. Not your education.

FOUR STUPID REASONS NOT TO STRIKE
my friends will think I'm turning into a hippy.
THERE'S NOTHING RADICAL ABOUT PROTECTING YOUR OWN INTERESTS AGAINST CUTBACKS AND FEE HIKES. ANY REPUBLICAN WOULD AGREE WITH THIS.
I just don't have the time.
YOU MIGHT BE SPENDING ALOT MORE TIME STUDYING THAN YOU EXPECT. IF THE STATE CUTS AWAY ANY MORE FUNDING YOU COULD END UP TAKING AN EXTRA YEAR TO COMPLETE YOUR DEGREE.
I'll screw up my whole semester.
THAT'S NOTHING COMPARED TO THE INCONVENIENCE YOU'LL FIND NEXT FEBRUARY. IF NOBODY DOES ANYTHING, THE LINES NEXT SEMESTER WILL MAKE LAST SEPTEMBER LOOK LIKE A GROCERY CHECKOUT.
What difference can skipping classes do? We're the only ones who'll suffer.
IT'S TRUE THAT OUR STRIKE WON'T BRING THE STATE TO A GRINDING HALT. BUT IT'S THE ONLY WAY TO MAKE IT KNOWN HOW MUCH HIGHER EDUCATION IS SUFFERING BECAUSE OF THE GOVERNMENT'S ROTTEN BUDGET HANDLING. IF WE CAN GET ENOUGH PUBLICITY AND MAKE THE RIGHT PEOPLE LOOK BAD, OUR DEMANDS CAN BE MET.

The 'Pro-Cynic' perspective

Guys, if you have female friends — and you wish to keep them — avoid discussing abortion. The conversation is destined to crumble into a scathing, bitter exchange.

This weekend I participated in "The National Mobilization for Women's Lives," a pro-choice/women's rights rally at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington. Muddling through all the euphemisms (pro-life, pro-choice, pro-abortion, pro-murder, anti-life, anti-choice, anti-abortion, etc.), I emerged from the hysteria as a "pro-cynic."

Darren Garnick

The rules for how long a sperm can hang out with an egg should be philosophy and religion based. If the state legislature starts dictating the ethics of pregnancy, they may as well introduce genital inspection stickers at our local gas stations.

When women express fear that the government may gain control of their bodies, I share that fear. HOWEVER . . .

Often when I attempt to discuss the ambiguity of the fetus, I am eventually strangled with the same silly argument.

"The only reason you say that," the lecture goes, "is because you are not a woman."

"If you only knew what it is like to be a woman for a month, a week, or even a day, you wouldn't be talking like this!"

Look, set me up with a semester internship. I guarantee that after I return my uterus, the dilemma will not be resolved.

This eternally irreconcilable debate over "life" was powerfully illustrated by opposing monuments temporarily erected for the rally.

Pro-lifers set up a mock graveyard to symbolize the "4,400 children [who] have died in abortion chambers" since 1973. A pro-choice "tombstone" nearby addressed abortion deaths from another angle, memorializing "the courageous women who die from illegal unsafe abortions because they have no choice."

Clearly, "life" does not mean the same thing to everyone.

A fetus might be a life. It may not be. There is no universal truth to help us escape from this ethical sinkhole. Many pro-life and pro-choice activists fail to concede this. To them, the issue is clear-cut and can be proven with "facts."

"Abortion is not murder. Outlawing abortion was and is a Nazi program," was one of many "facts" I read from signs which made me cringe. Although the general tone of the Washington rally was sincere, a vast amount of crass posters like this one detracted from the pro-choicer's appeal.

Slogans like, "Pork the Pope" and "Abort Bush", are not going to be effective in swaying the wishy-washy public towards the pro-choice cause. They reduce the abortion issue to dirty jokes.

Relegating the fetus to toilet paper status is dangerous. If people do not at least internally debate whether or not the fetus is a life, then an abortion operation will be considered as routine as a trip to McDonalds.

Sadly, at times this rally was stung by extreme McTackiness.

People transformed their children and pets into political billboards, suffocating them in the pro-choice wardrobe. Oh, isn't our puppy cute? She supports Roe vs. Wade!

As if the barrage of abortion t-shirts, bumper stickers, lapel pins, and fluorescent pink hats were not nauseating enough, Molly Yard — the president of the National Organization for Women — displayed her sales skills from the Lincoln Memorial steps.

Yard interrupted the rally with a cheesy ad for pro-choice souvenirs. She apologized for her tackiness using the fund-raising excuse, but it was too late. The moment she offered the $100 commemorative sash (autographed by feminist leaders!!!), Molly lost my respect.

NOW should realize that commercialism kills symbolism. If the rallying symbols of any political movement are cheapened, that movement is weakened. Molly's mid-rally t-shirt sale plea was a downer.

Anyone care for a chocolate coat-hanger?

Now who is being blatant?

What's America coming to?

Making sexual orientation a civil right?

As if you weren't blatant enough already, and today the law gives you more legal protection.

Look how far you've come without the law backing you up.

Chris Macek

I dread to think where you'll go with a law.

I mean I can't even walk through campus without some poster or sticker shouting in my face.

Just trying to get through Amherst — or God, have you been to Northampton lately — you're everywhere.

It's like wherever you turn, you're there, touching, giggling or even kissing?

Have you turned on the TV lately? Is nothing sacred anymore?

Last week I was watching "Thirty Something"—a show that had real potential, real people, and was going somewhere. Now I can't even veg in front of the tube without some obvious bedroom scene.

Do you think that the entire world revolves around sex!?!

Where is the decency that this country was built upon?

When will you stop, how far do you want to go?

We should be alarmed when I say studies predict that by the year 2000, you will make up more than 50 percent of our public school teachings.

These are the teachers of our children!

And don't think you're not already in the schools, insidiously promoting your lifestyles in ways which children can't escape.

How can we let this go on when statistics clearly show that you make up more than 90 percent of the offenders in cases of sexual abuse committed against children?

You are proven child molesters. Statistics are not myths!

You complain that we stereotype you. Well, let me give you another fact: more than 95 percent surveyed said that you would make an issue of your sexual orientation if it was ever questioned!

I don't make my sexuality a constant issue, why must you?

I am fortunate right now that none of you work in my office. But with this new civil rights protection, I'm afraid that you're not going to disappear. Well, if that's the case, I might be willing to compromise and do my share about not judging you because of your sexual orientation.

But I have one request of you: Could you heterosexuals (yes, "heterosexuals") not be so blatant?

Fine line divides the strikers

I'm a UMass student who supports the strike. I am prepared to confront any accompanying repercussions created due to negative press coverage.

Monday I was standing in front of Bartlett Hall when a man walked by with a scowl, sniffing like a dog. He crossed the picket line and turned to me. Maybe with guilt, he glanced away from my eyes, instead looking down at my sign. He said, "This thing stinks."

I thought to myself, what an eloquent, intuitive and profound statement. It left two men on either side of a picket line, in which neither one is savoring that putrid smell we refer to as the budget cuts.

Townes: An asset to the community

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Staff

To a great many members of the African-American community at this campus, Associate Dean of Students Rick Townes is a man who can be trusted.

"I have always felt a strong need in my life to improve the condition of Black people around the world, " Townes said, and his actions show the sincerity of that statement.

Townes is a Boston native, raised in the Orchard Park Housing Projects in Roxbury. Townes said he feels this environment has had a strong effect on his life.

"It was in Roxbury that I got my real education, where I learned about the ideas of Malcolm X, the Black Panther Party, and civil disobedience. A young Black person was expected to know these things," he said. "For example, I remember seeing Stokely Carmichael on a street corner trying to organize the young people. Roxbury was always rich in Black Nationalist thought.

"I didn't know Roxbury was a "bad" neighborhood back then, it was just my neighborhood. I learned things there which I could never learn in a classroom."

Townes arrived at the University of Massachusetts as a student in the fall of 1970, one year after the first New Africa House takeover. He said he experienced the same feelings many other minority students have when they come to the five-college area for the first time.

"It was a culture shock for us and them. Amherst was just not aware of Black people," he said.

During the early seventies, college campuses were alive with Civil Rights and Vietnam protests. Townes said he did not see himself as a leader at that time, but was active in the protest movement.

"I considered myself a militant for the rights of Black people then, and I still see myself that way now," he said.

In the fall of 1976, Townes was first employed by the University as a student advisor in the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Blacks and Minority Students. In 1981, he became assistant director of CCEBMS. In 1987 he received his current position as associate dean of students.

Townes has a long history of involvement with the concerns of African-American and minority students, showing his commitment to help the community.

- The Yvette Henry Case of 1984. When Henry was being prosecuted by the University in what many people have called a racist manner, Townes was there to help. "I was her CCEBMS counselor, and when the University forbade her to walk on campus unescorted, I was there to take her to her 8 a.m. class."
- The Southwest Riot. When Yancey Robinson was assaulted by a group of White students in the Southwest Residential Area, Townes got involved. "I was the first to go to Yancey's room to find out the facts. I then arranged for a room on campus for the community to meet and form a response to the assault. When witnesses were reluctant to speak to the police, many felt more comfortable talking to me."
- The New Africa House takeover of Spring 1988. Townes was involved as a mediator between the students and the administration. "I remember walking back and forth between Whitmore and the New Africa House in the snow, trying to help resolve the situation," Townes said. "However it is a fair criticism that I pressured the students to end the occupation to early. The promises Whitmore made seemed reasonable at the time, but I now see that many of the promises have not been kept."
- This semester's unofficial African-American student body meeting. When concerned students called this meeting to discuss new restrictions on the Malcolm X Center and unequal security costs, Townes and Professor Stephen Small of the sociology department were there to attempt to show the students that someone cared.

With Townes, African-American students know that there is at least one man who has sufficient courage and love for his brothers and sisters to stand up.

Rick Townes and his wife Valerie live in the Amherst area with one child of 12, and one more on the way.

ALANA Honor Society established

By A. SABRINA SUTHERLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Serving the African-American, Latino, Asian and Native American students is the new Honor Society being developed, called ALANA. Founded by Doris Clemmons, a Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black, Minority Students advisor, ALANA has been functioning since early October and now meets every Tuesday at 4 p.m. in the library of the New Africa House.

ALANA has been created to provide incentive, networking, and moral support for minority students who have achieved and are maintaining a high grade point average.

Although there are other honor societies on this campus, including a university wide group, Yaa Amoah, one of the recently elected co-presidents said, "You may be qualified, but the other organizations do not go out of their way to attract minority students, to make them feel comfortable within their midsts, or even to send them a letter of invitation. We are going out of our way for them."

The requirement for membership in ALANA is a 3.0 GPA. Clemmons, Amoah and co-president Cindy John, decided that this standard was high enough to attract motivated, hard working students, but should also be lower than other societies' as there are relatively few minority students on this campus.

The ALANA coordinators hope, however, that the influence and support of other students will encourage students to strive for even higher grades.

"We are actually hoping the GPA's will be closer to a 4.0 by the time they are graduating," Amoah said.

Students who successfully graduate as a ALANA student with a 3.5 GPA will receive cum laude status, in addition to special ALANA awards. In addition, as Clemmons explains, involvement in an honor society is impressive on a resume.

Those students who are interested in ALANA but do not have the required GPA have an alternative program offered to them. If they have at least a 2.5 GPA, they can attend ALANA meetings and functions. In addition they will be placed with an ALANA student as a mentor, who will help that student in whatever way possible, to raise their GPA, and subsequently receive ALANA student status.

During the semester ALANA also plans to invite special guest speakers and recruiters for the benefit of its members. Also, a visit to the Martin Luther King Memorial Center in Atlanta is in the works of next semester. Jackets and t-shirts are only some of the other incentives for working hard, that this organization plans to offer.

Also elected recently were, Steve Williams as co-Vice President with Michael Manuel, Janice Foster as co-treasurer, and Collete Greenstein with Richard Ducree as public relations officers and the secretarial position.

At present ALANA is applying to be a Registered Student Organization to provide a foundation on which to build membership, assure its viability after the co-presidents who are seniors graduate, and allow for funding from the Student Activities Trust Fund to increase the benefits it can offer to minority students.

BMCP: More than just funky music

By YVETTE RUSSELL
Collegian Correspondent

The Black Mass Communications Project, which has been in existence for 20 years, provides broadcasting service through radio and video presentations for the African-American community at the University of Massachusetts.

Annual events such as the Jea?arties, and movie nights are all part of BMCP's programming for the African-American community.

Kwanzaa, student fashion shows, rallies and guest speakers have all been covered by BMCP video operators. The BMCP disc jockeys also provide entertainment for social functions given by other Registered Student Organizations.

Kevin Mitchell, BMCP member and WMUA radio station program director, said that BMCP is a growing organization, and that since its beginnings, it has faced the challenge of meeting the needs of the African-American Community.

"BMCP is trying to expand its video branch in order to incorporate the million-dollar telecommunications project that the university is installing," Mitchell said.

In addition to funding the Malcolm X Center Picnic, BMCP recently co-sponsored a Halloween Party for African-American children of the Amherst area. The general manager of BMCP is Collette Greenstein. Kristian Greene is business manager, and Keith Campbell is music director.

The video director for the organization is UMass sophomore Peter Ribeiro.

BMCP operates out of the WMUA radio station Monday through Friday from 9:30 p.m. to midnight, on Saturdays from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., and on Sundays from 9 p.m. to midnight. The BMCP office is located in Room 402 of the Student Union Building.

Delta Sigma Theta

By REBECCA BOSWELL
Collegian Correspondent

Delta Sigma Theta Sorority Incorporated is a public service organization established at Howard University, on January 13, 1913. It was founded to foster the principles of "Scholarship, Sisterhood and Service" among college-educated Black women, according to Soror Rebecca Ridley.

Delta Sigma Theta has grown over the years to include more than 175,000 members and 150 chapters nationwide and abroad, including chapters in Germany, Korea, Liberia and throughout the Caribbean.

Δ Σ Θ

The chapter active in the local area is Pi Iota, the Springfield city chapter. Founded on June 2, 1985, Pi Iota chapter has consistently sponsored programs and addressed issues for public service, according to Soror Yvette Russell, corresponding secretary for the chapter.

The goals and programs of Pi Iota chapter of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority adhere to the national sorority's Five Point Thrust Program, which consists of Educational Development, Economic Development, Physical and Mental Health, Political Awareness and Involvement, and International Awareness and Involvement.

Acting President of Pi Iota chapter of Delta Sigma Theta is Sonja Vaughan, a senior sports management major at the University of Massachusetts. Soror Vaughan is a former member of the UMass track team.

Pi Iota Vice President Dawanna Williams is a senior at Smith College. The Treasurer of Pi Iota chapter is UMass senior Theresa Jefferson, and UMass senior Lori Perry is recording secretary. Nationally, Delta Sigma Theta addresses issues concerning teenage pregnancy and voter registration. It sponsors programs such as Say No to Drugs and Learn to Read, among others. Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, Inc. also addresses the African Diaspora, a national organization which provides funding for its members to study abroad.

Locally, the Pi Iota chapter has participated in the fundraising walk to benefit the A Better Chance charity organization. They also sponser a benefit variety show for ABC.

At Thanksgiving, the Deltas participate in a canned food drive through the Martin Luther King Church in Springfield. Pi Iota chapter participates in the Great American Smoke-Out annually, and visits area nursing homes. At UMass, Pi Iota also sponsors study hall sessions.

The sisters of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority say they are looking forward to their Delta Week, which incorporates a variety of social and educational programming workshops.

Some distinguished Deltas are the actress and writer Ruby Dee, poet Nikki Giovanni, the singers Lena Horne and Roberta Flack, and the politicians Barbara Jordan and Shirley Chisholm, the first Black congresswoman.

Prominent women from the Pi Iota chapter include Alvin Ailey dancer Gaye Griger of Smith College who now dances with the Alvin Ailey dancers and Tamara Callahan who is now enrolled at Harvard Medical School.

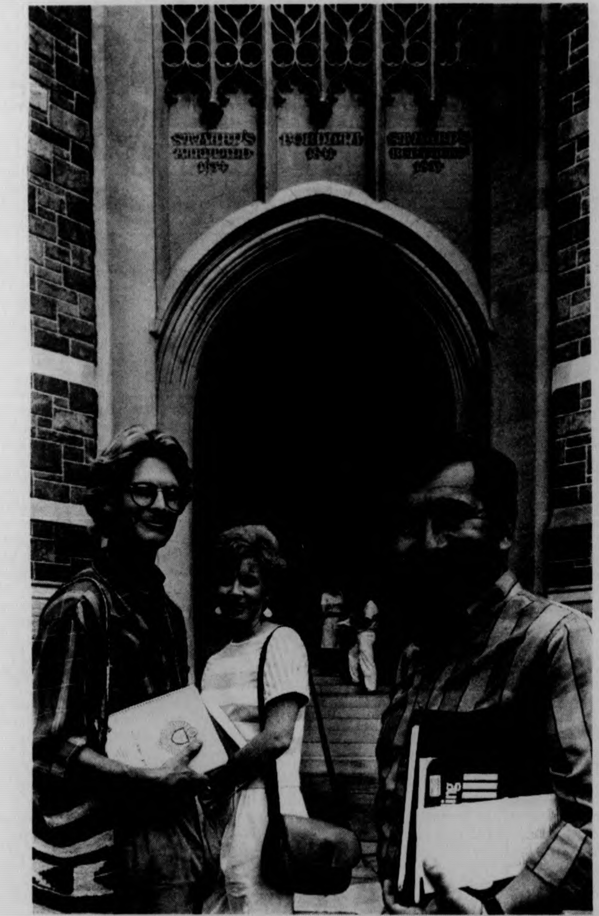
"We have three important objectives in going for graduate studies in the arts and sciences: academic achievement, professional advancement and personal enrichment. Fordham satisfies all three."

Luis Mejia with Peter Hatlie and Barbara Young, Graduate School of Arts & Sciences



The Graduate School of Arts & Sciences, Bronx, New York
FORDHAM
The Jesuit University of New York City

A Master's, Doctorate or a course for personal enrichment from Fordham's Graduate School of Arts & Sciences is everything it should be.

As Peter Hatlie says, "It's very rewarding—the professors demand a lot, but they give back a lot—they're very accessible."

It carries with it a respect which has been earned through Fordham's longstanding commitment to excellence.

The Fordham tradition, plus our broad curriculum, will help you achieve the goal you've set for yourself—enrichment, scholarship or professional reward.

And if you prefer to start with enrichment courses now, you may take as many as 12 credits which will count towards your degree once you're accepted.

We invite all undergraduate degree holders to discover more about our numerous and varied programs. They range from the natural and social sciences to the humanities and include such programs as our multi-disciplinary International Political Economy and Development.

ARTS & LIVING

Father-son night comes to the movies

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

THE SCREENING ROOM

Take one part Terms of Endearment, two parts On Golden Pond and stir. What you get is Dad, director Gary David Goldberg's heartbreaking tribute to father/son bonding.

Jack Lemmon is Jake Tremont, a 78-year-old stuck in the rut of a routine life under the domineering rule of his cynical wife, brilliantly played by Olympia Dukakis. Unable to care for himself, Lemmon is rendered helpless when Dukakis is hospitalized after a heart attack.

Enter the long lost son played by Ted Danson. A power hungry, Wall Street stock broker, Danson comes home to care for the old man while Mom recovers. He's stunned by Lemmon's inability to even put his pajamas on, and sets out to get dad back on his feet. They play ball, go to Bingo and even renew Lemmon's driver's license while tyrannical Dukakis is laid up in a hospital bed.

When Lemmon is diagnosed with cancer, he goes into shock, revealing a hidden schizoid personality. Dukakis' control over his life caused him to retreat into an imaginary world in which he fantasized about a more pleasant existence while living under her dictatorship. When Lemmon finally snaps out of his catatonia, Danson goes to every length to curb Dukakis, allowing Lemmon to finally live out the happiness he only dreamed of. The cancer, however, spreads, sending Lemmon back into the hospital and forcing Danson to confront his father's death.

Danson turns in a surprisingly good performance, bringing the right mix of confusion and desperateness to his role, creating a character we can all identify with. His efforts to reconcile lost time with his father serve the dual purpose of establishing a relationship with his own estranged son. Danson is a man without an identity, searching for a life and a family he let pass him by. It's the tragedy of Danson's plight that makes him so appealing, drawing some strong emotional responses from the audience.

Although Danson is worthy of praise, it's Lemmon who carries the film. His performance is brilliant, assuring him a seat at the Oscars. When strange things start occurring within him, the look in his eyes drives home his fear and confusion with piercing conviction. While laying in his hospital bed waiting for surgery, Lemmon grabs Danson by the arm, teary-eyed. "I hear that men hug one another now. We've never hugged before." I defy anyone to admit not having a lump in their throat as Danson climbs into the bed and father and son embrace.

Despite its' conventional story, Dad scores high marks on the strength of its performances. Director/writer Gary David Goldberg seems more interested in manipulating his audience rather than telling a story. His idea of making Lemmon's character appealing is to have the actor give us lost puppy expressions and dressing up in silly clothes. Fortunately, Lemmon keeps his director in tow, maintaining the dignity of his character by allowing the emotion to evolve out of the context of the scene rather than a directional cue.

It's Lemmon's enthusiasm and gentle innocence that makes Dad a heartwarming celebration of life. The film's not afraid to go for the heart strings to get its meaning across, and I wouldn't be surprised if the number of phone calls to grandparents and parents alike should go up after seeing this film.

Dad may not be a great film, but it's an important one that challenges us to overcome our differences and learn to forgive. Bring plenty of tissues.

There are many other movie treats playing the Valley this week. Francois Truffaut's final screenplay, The Little Thief plays at Tower Theaters. Heavy Petting, a documentary featuring David Byrne, William Burroughs and the late Abbie Hoffman, from the makers of The Atomic Cafe, plays at Pleasant St. Theater. And the Academy of Music finally reopens with Drugstore Cowboy, starring Matt Dillon and Kelly Lynch.

Students show creative side

By JAMES ELLIOT
Collegian Correspondent

In a small room, not much larger than a dorm room, rests the artwork which makes up the second annual Butterfield Arts Group Exhibition.

Located in Wheeler House in Central Residential Area, this collection of sculptures, photographs, paintings, sketches, poetry and collage is surprisingly successful for an amateur effort. While it did include some of the less than fantastic projects that one expects from exhibitions like these, a good portion of the projects were imaginative and very well done.

The gallery has attracted the interest of many students. An opening reception on Wednesday, Nov. 8, had 96 people in attendance. At the reception there was a live musical performance, a reading of the poetry of Connolly Ryan, and the artists were present to talk with visitors about their work.

Amy Walsh is probably one of the more talented, and certainly one of the more popular artists with work on display in the exhibit. Walsh, with the help of Andre Busi, did two collages mimicking the covers of fashion

Negativland
Hampshire College
Monday, Nov. 13

If you've ever had the opportunity to see Negativland but haven't, it's your loss. This silly SST band from Northern California are the funniest trio, and the best of its kind the label has to offer. If your parents are members of the PMRC you may have heard them bitch and complain about Negativland and their "role" in the mysterious death of a frustrated teenage Christian's parents a year or two ago. Apparently the boy listened to their song, "Christianity is Stupid," then had an argument and eventually killed mum and dad with an axe. How much of that is fact and how much is fiction is irrelevant, but the tape-looper for the trio had lots of fun last night cutting in little samples of the interviews with the press and phone calls from the boy's family.

Negativland have barrels of laughs over their stage gimmicks as well. How many bands do you go see for two dollars, get to listen to Casey Kasem outakes — "U2? This is bullshit. Who gives a shit about these guys? I'm sick of introducing whimpy-ass bands like this!" — mixed in with other outrageous tape-loops like "Time," "I Want a Piece of Meat!" and "And I Remember." Then imagine crosslooping these samples, "I want a piece of REO Speedwagon meat! Time. I want a piece of Bonnie Tyler meat!" Hard to comprehend? It's one of the many losses from the non-experience of Negativland.

Negativland do other stage props that are exciting, such as spray Glade air freshener, cut off their fingers to stupid songs, sing about not being able to get an orgasm on the Playboy channel and then burn toast. When their songs drag on a bit too long, they and the audience, enjoy the rantings of drunk people screaming obnoxious obscenities into the mike, which shakes them up causing them, literally, to throw one-hundred one dollar bills into the audience. When was the last time you went to see a band worth paying money to see, and in turn they pay you? Now isn't that a band really worth seeing?

Takeover!
Turner and Belknap Ed.
The International Oil Working Group

The full title is "Takeover! Students USA mobilize for the 90's. Documents from the Movement." And that pretty well sums up what is within the pages of this highly informative documentation of the movement "to stop military-funded death research on the [UMass] campus."

Using memos, handbills, letters, court statements, poems, editorials, photographs, art, newspaper articles and first hand accounts this book gives about as thorough a presentation of the spirit of this campus in the face of bureaucratic viciousness, as anyone could hope to see, (or wish not to see in some cases).

"The book is an exercise of collectivism, it's a higher level of democracy that we're practicing. We're talking about the new world emerging from the old," said Timothy Belknap, co-editor of the publication.

It begins with a reprinted speech given by the late C.L.R. James on "The Pursuit of Happiness." James says that life is about "engaging in a process of movement towards understanding and controlling what makes your life." It is this spirit that the book rightfully celebrates and revels in.

"Takeover" is made up of 15 chapters that takes the confusion and chaos of this last year and puts it into, if not perspective (this is not a conservative publication), then at least some kind of overview of events that are still being discussed, often with a great deal of discrepancies.

But, of course, in light of recent events, "Takeover" is not just a history, it is also an inspiration. It shows, in no uncertain terms, that people at UMass have a history of fighting for what they believe in, that you have a right to speak up for yourself, for whatever you think is wrong. It shows that there are many others who are sick of sitting and accepting the every thought and action of the powers that be. And it shows that by non-violent fighting change can, in some measure, be effected.

Hard facts and figures on the reality that is Anthrax and the treatment non violent protesters received at the hands of local and campus police are interspersed with occasionally humorous pages (this is, after all, by and about students). But the notes of deadly seriousness and absolute importance are stamped indelibly onto the pages.

It all ends with a reprinted poster. It reads: "Wake up from your sleep, 'cause what the meek inherit is only three feet deep." And, in bigger letters: "THERE IS A REVOLUTION going on. Want to say f you to oppressive bureaucracy, and have a great time doing it. — join us." I like that.

"Takeover" is published by the The International Oil Working Group, Inc, P.O. Box 1410, Cathedral Station N.Y., N.Y, 10025. It can also be obtained through the Albion bookstore and Food for Thought, both in Amherst, as well as in the Campus Center Bookstore. Cost is about $10 due to the cost of producing the book.

Greeks to picket & march today

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

In a show of solidarity with the ongoing student strike, University of Massachusetts fraternity and sorority members will picket academic buildings and march in protest today, said John Silveria, president of Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity.

The picketing will go on all day and the march will begin at 3:15 p.m. at Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity House, he said.

"There are already 150 [members] actively striking by picketing," he said.

Silveria said that out of the 1,200 Greek members on campus, more than half have participated in the strike to some extent.

Most fraternity and sorority houses have draped signs either advertising that the members support the strike or that they oppose budget cuts to state higher education, he said.

"Since we are out on the main street on the way to the University, that gives us high visibility," he said. Many fraternity and sorority houses are located on busy North Pleasant St.

Silveria said members of his fraternity will be hit hard if the tuition and fee increases are instituted.

"Sigma Phi Epsilon could lose ten out of the forty brothers and fourteen pledges in the fraternity," he said, adding that other fraternities and sororities expect similar impacts.

However, he added that the Greek Area Government has not yet voted on its position regarding the strike. To endorse the strike, GAG would need to have each individual fraternity and sorority house vote to support the strike, he said.

With an album called Frank, one would expect straight-ahead simple pop melodies. But Squeeze can't do anything simply. Even their biggest hits, "Hourglass," "Tempted" and "Pulling Muscles From a Shell," are laced with intelligent lyrics and intricate instrumentation.

Indeed, Chris Difford and Glenn Tilbrook have proven to be two of the best songwriters of our age. With the possible exception of 1985's Cosi Fan Tutti Frutti, the duo have constantly penned perfect pop songs that say a lot more than, "Baby, I love you, so let's do the deed in the back seat of my car."

Frank offers some of Difford and Tilbrook's most finely-crafted songs, as well as a few extra surprises. Colorful pianist Jools Holland adds some variety with "Dr. Jazz," his tribute to the Louisiana style of music. And Difford's flat vocals are perfect for "Slaughtered, Gutted and Heartbroken," a catchy little number about a man who always finds himself "A stitch short of a tapestry."

Much of the rest of the album contains the usual infectious, humorous, detailed pop classics. On "If It's Love," Tilbrook sings, "If it's love, then my teeth are clean for a change." Other tunes, "Rose I Said," "Love Circles" and Melody Motel," are just as perfect.

The best song by far is "She Doesn't Have To Shave." This would have been their biggest hit since "Hourglass" if radio had the balls to play a song that deal with menstruation. It's funny, sympathetic and damn bouncy. In other words, a typically perfect Difford and Tilbrook song.

Another gifted songwriter who continually glorifies everyday life is Ray Davies of the Kinks. But Davies is past his prime and constantly reworking his former successes. This is evident in the slew of greatest hits and live albums the band has recently put out.

Squeeze serves up the usual perfection

UK Jive is all new material, and after one listen, it becomes obvious why Davies has been constantly rehashing his old stuff.

Almost every song on the album is a mediocre remake of an old one. Even his usual brilliant lyrics have been reduced to preachy drivel. The lovable loser has become chronic complainer. Songs like "Aggravation," "How Do I Get Close" and "What Are We Doing" are nothing but bitchfests. In "Entertainment" he complains about the sensationalism of TV news. How original Ray.

But besides that, the songs are often flat. The upbeat songs sound like what they are, an aging rocker trying to sound young and hip.

Brother Dave Davies' three scorching rockers at the end (only one on the album version) sound like a totally different band and are out of place. It sounds like it's time for Dave to to step out in the limelight and form his own hard-rock band.

"Now and Then" and "Looney Balloon," although both a bit hokey, are the saving graces of the album. On earlier albums, they would have been just average songs that would have received little notice. It is songs like these that we used to expect from Ray Davies. Now we expect, and get, much less.

I expected much more from the Tragically Hip. A band with a name like that has got to be cool. Wrong. On their debut album, Up to Here, the best they can do is sound like bad Cult clones. Lead singer Gordon Downie tries his best to sound like Ian Astbury, but his passion just isn't as sincere.

Downie's angst filled lyrics are a step above those of the usual bluesy rock 'n' roll bands today. The man is a fine storyteller, as "Thirty-Eight Years Old" will attest to. But the music is stale and the sound is overproduced. Once these boys find a sound of their own, they could go places. The potential is there.

Albums are rated on a one to five star basis, with five stars being the best.

magazines such as Cosmopolitan. These works, Media Woman 1 and Media Woman 2, with their humorous headlines, "My saddlebags stick out past my hips, usually I just complain and hit them. I haven't been able to pound them down yet," "Ovulation, how and when he wants it," He says: to bra or not to bra," "My face is so round I'd like to yank out my molars to acquire cheekbones," and the like were very popular.

Walsh also did a pencil drawing of a man and a woman in which the image is sectioned into squares and randomly dispersed onto the page successfully breaking up the logical sequence of the picture. Admirers must put the pieces together themselves, even though the subject is obvious. The piece must be seen to be fully appreciated.

Another artist worth mentioning is Steven Busch, who contributed two watercolors of John Lennon. While these were well done and pleasant to look at, they were not as imaginitive as his computer image, Self-Portrait.

Imaginative, however, is the word that comes to mind upon seeing the collage done by Ted Eiseman. Ocean is a combination of the remains of magazines, books and maps, which does much for the eye.

The exhibit was very well done for a student effort. The better works offset the other less creative pieces. While it does not compare to more professional presentations, the exhibit is well worth seeing, especially when you consider that admission is free.

Until the exhibit closes on Nov. 19, it is a good way to spend a half hour or so. It is definitely one of the better amateur presentations around. One who saw the previous Butterfield exhibition told me, "This one is better than the other one. I like it better, it's . . . diverse."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Certain promises made to you a long time ago will be fulfilled. Problems with a loved one can be resolved if you refuse to let pride stand in the way. A rue reconciliation is possible early in the new year. An intuitive understanding of what others are feeling will give you an advantage next March. A born peacemaker, you often find yourself assigned the role of mediator or negotiator. Your associates envy your ability to keep your cool.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: actor Ed Asner, artis Georgia L'Keeffe, WWII Gen. Curis Le May, singer Peula Clark, actor Sam Waterston.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Exciting people or events add glamour to your day. A new partnership will brighten your financial future. Seek the advice of a lawyer or accountant. Romance is in a holding pattern.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A long-distance message sends your spirits soaring. Spend more time with an older person who is unable to handle personal affairs. A work problem requires careful deliberation.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Follow some offbeat advice about your career or finances. Originality is a tremendous asset now. Romance contains several surprises. Do your best to meet your fiscal obligations.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Unusual alliances and agreements can be forged today. You may be in line for new recognition. Share your thoughts with those who can offer objective opinions. Repay favors promptly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Be careful not to overreact to a remark made in all innocence. Others may not understand the pressure you feel. You probably need to get more rest. Romance has its ups and downs.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Some of you take off on business jaunts; others receive overseas visitors or calls. An important agreement can be negotiated today. Socially and romantically, you know you are loved.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Keep one eye on a brighter future, and the other on today's details. Our relaxed, amiable mood could cause you to let certain obligations slide. Break a self-indulgent habit.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your keen intuition will point the way to a workable solution if you do not complicate matters by trying to figure out all the angles. Do not second-guess your instincts. Romance beckons.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Subject your visionary ideas to practical scrutiny. Do not be surprised if fanciful whims fail the test. Curb a tendency to be sarcastic or you could make enemies. Cherish a platonic relationship.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Handle any problems with co-workers tactfully. Avoid people who may try to play both ends against the middle. A little romance will quickly rejuvenate a fading relationship. Show your sentimental side.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Work details demand your attention. Your leadership skills and overall concepts are sound. Do not discuss your personal affairs with your co-workers. Too much familiarity breeds contempt.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Share your thoughts with those who will give you objective advice. Your mood changes rapidly. Do not let minor setbacks get you down. A small adventure will lift you out of the doldrums.

The season opens Friday, November 17th, in Natick against the Boston College Eagles. The team will also play Tufts, Springfield, Southern Connecticut and Brown before the semester break.

"We always get up for B.C. We hate B.C., and they hate us," said Yarworth. "The game we'll be keying on is Brown. Brown is the next level of competition. Brown and the Ivy League don't compete for the New Englands."

During intersession, the team will play Northeastern, Williams, Amherst, Rhode Island and Connecticut. When classes resume, they face New Hampshire, then close out the season with Boston University.

"B.U. should be the biggest meet of the season," Yarworth said. "They again, are another level up, because they are a high scholarship program. We've had some good meets with them in the past."

"I'm so psyched for the season to begin," Yarworth said. "I really enjoy this, so I'm lucky to be here."

the names of Joe Livorsi and James Chute.

Both seniors weren't always in the lead roles however, but managed to get there with constant hard work and determination.

"Joe has gotten better every year, because he loves it," said O'Brien. "You never have to worry about Joe, because he's always willing to put in the work.

"Jimmy has always been plagued by injuries, so his development as a distance runner has been slow. He eventually learned his limitations and began to excel. He's always been in the background, so when he saw his chance to grab the limelight, he didn't hesitate.

"Both runners were the glue holding a team together early in a season when we could have easily fallen apart."

Diving to keep Reds on top

It was a stingy defense that got the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team as far as the NCAA quarterfinals, and it was keyed by goalkeepers Mary Curtis (right) and Skye Eddy (above). Curtis, one of the team's four captains, had a spectacular senior year. Eddy finished her first year of collegiate play with an undefeated 5-0-2 record, and established herself as the Reds' goalkeeper of the future.

Minutewomen swept by NU in season closer

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team dropped a three-game match to Northeastern at Totman Gym last night to end their season at 2-27.

Sullivan injured as UM finishes at 2-27

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team's hopes of ending their season on a positive note didn't come true last night as they lost in three straight games to Northeastern University 15-4, 15-11, 15-4, finishing with a record of 2-27.

In the first game, the Huskie offense, led by Linda Dormuth and Marlo Le Vangie, allowed NU to jump out to a quick 5-0 lead behind some powerful serving. The Minutewomen, two timeouts and two sideouts later, dug their early grave even deeper, falling behind 11-0. Fighting to stay in the first game, a Sharon Panoff tip put the first points on the board for UMass. A block by Rachel Bredemeier and Panoff plus two Huskie errors enabled the Minutewomen to score three more points but that would be all as the Huskies wrapped the game up with two strong Le Vangie serves and a Christine Frein tip.

With four players missing from their roster because of a recent measles outbreak at NU, the Huskies (19-7) still had a balanced attack to dominate the Minutewomen for the entire match.

"I knew that NU would be tough," UMass coach Carol Ford said. "Even with four kids missing, they were still strong."

"They [NU] were able to hit the corners which is hard to defend,"Ford said. "We needed a bigger blocker which we do not have."

With a plethora of Totman fans supporting them, the Minutewomen turned the tables around on the Huskies, mounting a 7-0 lead with great plays by Julieta Santiago and Nancy Sullivan. Santiago, who played in her last collegiate match, came up with a tip, a block with Bredemeier, and two of her 10 match kills in that runoff of points.

As has been the case in earlier matches this season, the Minutewomen allowed the Huskies right back into the match. NU recaptured the lead with nine unanswered points, five off UMass errors. Part of UMass' troubles were due to Sullivan spraining her left ankle, taking her out of the rest of the match.

"When Nancy went out with that bad sprain, it gave us trouble with our new rotation," Ford said. "After that we just wanted to hang in there and not make any excuses."

As in the first game, the Huskies took advantage of any error committed by the Minutewomen. NU scored two points easily, catching UMass off guard with short serves by Dori Pancoast and Jennifer Johnson to give them the [7-0] lead for good. The Minutewomen would score only three more points, one of which was a service ace by Karin Horlbeck.

Obviously a disappointing season in many ways for the Minutewomen, Ford plans to work very hard in preparing the team for next year.

" I'm glad the season is over. It was a very difficult rebuilding season," Ford said. "We're going to miss Julieta but the rest of the team is still young."

Minutemen rate as early frontrunners

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

Coach Russ Yarworth's swimming team has been the New England Champions for the last three years in a row, compiling a 10-2 record last season. Over the past four years, they own a 52-4 mark, including a stretch of 41 consecutive victories. The Minutemen are not planning on losing this year, and are the odds on favorite to repeat as champs yet again.

"Our prospects for this year are as good, if not better than last year," Yarworth said. "I'm not predicting an undefeated season, because you can't win every duel meet."

Coach Yarworth's goal is to win the New Englands again. To do this, his team must work hard all season. If that means not resting and sacrificing a duel meet, then so be it.

"Last year, we lost two meets with Boston College and Boston University at the beginning and end of the season," Yarworth said. "Both of those teams were rested, tapered and shaved, while we weren't. I'm not going to sacrifice our winning the New England Championships to win a duel meet. You can only peak once or twice a year. I'd rather have us peak after we've had all of our training and are going for the championship."

The Minutemen are loaded with depth and talent this year. Yarworth has 24 returning swimmers, including 13 seniors. He also has 11 new freshmen who should prove to be the backbone of the future.

"I've got more kids on the team than ever," said Yarworth. "I'll go out on a limb and say this is the best team I've ever had here at UMass."

The Minutemen will be led by senior freestyler, Brian McIver. McIver is the best swimmer on the squad, and has been New England champ in the 100-meter freestyle since his freshman year. McIver also holds the school records in the 50- and 100-meter freestyle. He is also closing in on the 200-meter record.

G.T. Ladd, Dan Chesnicka, Dave Ehle and the rest of the senior class will help give UMass the victory.

"That core of kids have done a super job for us," Yarworth said. "They've been our backbone for three years."

Harriers finish on high note at IC4A

By JON REIDEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team closed out its roller coaster ride season with a 15th-place finish at the IC4A Championships this past Saturday at Wavenly Park in New Canaan, CT.

The 'ride' started off on a rocky note as the Minutemen finished a disappointing third place against Boston College and Yale and found themselves at the bottom of a talented six-team field, which included three nationally-ranked teams.

The 'ride' moved on an upward swing the following weekend, as the Minutemen finished a strong second to nationally ranked Providence College and then winning the Eastern Conference Championship against a host of well-respected teams.

The next two weekends again proved to be turbulant, as the Minutemen finished a somewhat disappointing third at the Atlantic 10 Championships, then found redemption seven days later with a surprising fourth at The New England Championships.

Finally, the 'ride' came to an end at The IC4A's with a respectable 15th place finish in a meet that featured eight teams who had been ranked in the nations top twenty at one time or another throughout the season.

Although it was a season of many ups and downs, coach Ken O'Brien was more than satisfied with the progress of his inexperienced squad.

"From the start I knew we'd be good," said O'Brien. "But the kids didn't sense it so much. Eventually the team started to realize it as well and it carried over for most of the rest of the season. Overall, the team exceeded my initial expectations a little, but they exceeded their own a lot."

At the IC4A meet the best that the Minutemen could have expected to finish was 12th. Although they finished 15th the gap was so small that O'Brien wasn't disappointed.

" I knew that twelfth was the absolute best that we could have finished," said O'Brien. But in a meet of this size and caliber a matter of a few seconds could mean quite a few places. We were a total of nine seconds from finishing twelfth, so I wasn't disappointed."

Leading the Minutemen on Saturday as he has all year was junior Art Smith. His 38th place finish in a time of 30:28 (an average of 4:53 a mile) over the 10-kilometer course was accomplished among most of the nation's finest runners, as the IC4A meet is second in talent only to the NCAA Championships.

Finishing off an incredible season for the Minutemen was junior Jon Corso who completed the course in 50th place with a time of 30:43. Corso wasn't expected to be in the top five at the end of the previous cross country season, but managed to put together a rugged summer of training to propel himself into the second man slot for UMass as well as one of the best in New England.

Another pleasant surprise for the Minutemen was freshman Mike Davis. Davis gradually moved himself up the UMass hierarchy, culminating on Saturday when he finished fourth for the Minutemen in 143rd place in a time of 31:56.

With such a young team the Minutemen needed guidance early, and it came in the form of two seniors by

GEO joins strike and votes to cancel classes today

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization, which represents 500 to 700 University of Massachusetts teaching assistants, voted overwhelmingly yesterday to participate in the Union of Undergraduates strike and cancel classes today and tomorrow.

The GEO, said the strike has two goals: to protest budget cuts to higher education and to increase the GEO membership so the group can enter into collective bargaining with the administration.

She said the two-day strike is a step to ending the budget crisis and not a solution to the problem.

"The effort is not going to stop after Friday," she said. "We are going to go out and create a voice for graduate student programs."

Brian Crawford, a Union of Undergraduates strike organizer and Commuter Area senator, said one of the keys to the success of the strike is the support of teaching assistants.

"This shows that instructors support the strike and are willing to stand up to defend the University," he said. "The strike is gathering more support. It has faculty support, union support and the next step is to build legislative support through lobbying efforts."

Heberle said the GEO requests that graduate student employees lobby the Legislature, help sign up new GEO members, participate in student strike activities and attend a rally at noon today outside the Student Union. The GEO has about 950 members and needs 650 more before to reach a majority. Once the organization has 1,600 members, it can demand collective bargaining with the administration, she said.

"The union can [negotiate] for health benefits and a

Students refocus lobbying effort after Statehouse visit

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – A major success for a group of 33 University of Massachusetts students who made a Statehouse lobbying trip yesterday was receiving a list of potential swing votes in the legislature for progressive taxes that could restore money to the University, according to one student leader.

Rep. Marjorie A. Clapprood, (D-Sharon), provided the list that Speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate John Dulap said will help students focus their lobbying.

"Right now we have about 50 legislators who are honest enough to advocate taxes and about 40 who are absolutely opposed to taxes," said Clapprood who listed 28 representatives as undecided.

"You [as students] are the biggest critical mass. You could put this over the top," Clapprood said.

Clapprood, candidate for lieutenant governor in the November 1990 elections, and other representatives told students that handwritten letters and phone calls to their legislators are effective.

The Student Government Association, which coordinated the trip, will hold a letter writing drive beginning at 9 a.m. today in the Student Union Ballroom. Names of legislators and mailing supplies will be provided, Dunlap said.

Undergraduate student senator Jason Kofman, (Commuters), said, "Today will only be a success if there is a massive outpouring of letters and phone calls to the Statehouse over the next two days."

Rep. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) has two pending amendments to a bill that without the amendments could potentially hurt UMass.

One would restore $25 million dollars that has been cut from public higher education. A second amendment is a declaration of support for a committment to public higher education that could be used as a lobbying point for a tax package that will be brought before the House by December.

The problem with the first amendment is that if it passed, it would be symbolic victory because the state may not release the $25 million from its coffers, he said.

Reps.' vote to save TA jobs

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The House of Representatives voted last night to cut the state "03" account by 20 percent, but exempt all public higher education personnel paid out of that fund.

Rep. Stanley Rosenberg, (D-Amherst), said a compromise was reached that will force all public higher education employees paid with '03" funds to go through a process of being fired then rehired. But in the end, none of them will lose their jobs, he said.

"All teaching assistants, research assistants, part-time faculty and other employees paid for by "03" funds will be secure in their positions," he said.

Workers under the state's "03" account are not entitled to fringe benefits or pensions. A large percentage of the "03" funds pay for consultants and temporary help.

Rosenberg said if the UMass "03" account was not spared and the administration decided to move employees from the "03" fund to another account, student fees may have been raised.

Rosenberg said the bill is expected to save about $30 million, and he said he did not think the student strike influenced the representatives' votes.

Rothman and 2 others fined

NORTHAMPTON – A University of Massachusetts student and two former students were convicted yesterday in Northampton District Court of assaulting two University undergraduates last spring.

Greg Rothman, a conservative student leader who graduated last spring, was fined $90 for assaulting students Ted Chambers and Robb Smith in Central Residential Area on March 7. Former student, Brian Darling, and student Doug Dratch were each fined $100.

Strikers march to town

Rally beginning at Haigis Mall attracts 3,000

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

The strikers participating in the class boycott against repeated budget cuts to higher education went on a one-mile road trip yesterday to the Amherst Town Common.

Some 3,000 students left Haigis Mall after a ceremony at "Education Graveyard" — a mock cemetery complete with tombstones commemorating the programs, departments, staff, and faculty that have been "assassinated" by the budget cuts — and walked to North Pleasant St.

The procession of students stretched about three quarters of a mile, Amherst police said. Strikers chanted "Hey hey, ho ho, budget cuts have got to go" as they walked through town.

The strikers decided to march off-campus to demonstrate to state and community members that the boycott is not solely for higher education but also for human services and other agencies that have been slashed, said Lisa Nelson, strike organizer.

"The strike is meant to generate support to raise taxes," she said. "We need full discourse with all alumni, community members, parents, relatives and all the other public campuses in this state."

Strikers crowded the sidewalks and avoided walking in the streets to prevent potential traffic jams. Employees and customers left the stores to cheer the procession as it passed through town. Amherst police didn't interfere with the line of students and instead cooperated by turning the traffic lights off so they remained red until the students passed through town.

Strikers converged on the Amherst Common to listen to several speakers.

"There is a group of students who have been affected by the cuts that are not here, and we cannot see the thousands of students already locked out of the University because of the cuts," said Eric Nakajima, student trustee. "We're fighting to stay in here, and there are others who will never have this chance to fight."

Strikers then walked to the Southwest Residential Area and urged more students to strike. They chanted "Join the strike, join the strike" to the students who were watching from the windows in their dorms.

Homeless sit in at Statehouse

20 people arrested, including an 18-month-old baby

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Police arrested 20 people yesterday, including an 18-month-old baby, and ended a vigil for the homeless set up on the Statehouse floor.

Donna Burton, 29, of Boston, and her son Alecc were among more than 100 homeless people and their supporters who spread blankets on the floor of Nurses Hall, promising they would not leave until the state promises to restore $700,000 to a winter shelter program.

Burton said, "It's a shame for a year-and-a-half-old child to have a police record."

The police arrested the people who refused to leave, which necessarily included the toddler because of the mother's refusal. Burton has been living at the YMCA in Boston with the understanding that she could be forcread, "Tax the rich. Don't kill the poor."

The event was in memory of Timmothy Flynn, who died after spending a cold night on Boston Common last winter.

Karen McCarthy, a member of the Somerville Homeless Coalition said, "We're demonstrating in order to get more money for housing and to get more shelters for homeless people."

Leroy Van Valkenburg, 51, who said he had planned on getting arrested yesterday, has lived on the streets for the past 10 years.

He said he stays in shelters like Rosie's Place and the Pine Street Inn during the winter months, but said often times there is no room for him due to overcrowding.

Van Valkenburg, who said he was bailed out by the peace group, Homes Not Bombs, said, "We need the money now. We can't wait. There are people dying on the streets

Some students criticize strike and picketers

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Many students believe that by boycotting classes to protest budget cuts they do more damage to their education than good, and instead have taken up low-risk protesting activities.

Richard Anderson, a senior mechanical engineering major, said he agrees legislators need to be persuaded into voting for no more education cuts, but doesn't think striking classes is the most economical way to do it.

"Most of my professors keep going [teaching], they will fail you. They don't care," he said.

While he has kept going to classes, he said the rallies this week have caused him to be more politically aware, and he called his representative for the first time Tuesday.

Tara Igoe, a senior communications major, said she attended classes regularly this week. She participated in budget cut rallies on campus and has spoken to her representative more than once.

"I work hard all summer to pay my way through school," she said. "People are caught, they don't know what to do. They don't want to lose every thing they worked for all semester."

She said she admires anyone who is doing something to try and stop budget cuts to higher education.

Stephanie Cook, a junior majoring in theatre, said she talked to her representative at the Statehouse rally in Boston last month and gave him a follow-up call.

"I can't see what it proves if 2,000 to 3,000 students flunk out and can't return next semester whether they can afford it or not," said Cook, who has participated in recent rallies.

She said the picketers were polite to her on Monday but harassed her on Tuesday and yesterday. "I'm angry at the Legislature, but I'm more angry at the picketers now," she said.

Walesa gets cheers from Congress

WASHINGTON (AP) — Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, given a roaring welcome by Congress, today welcomed moves to send millions of dollars of aid to Poland but said far more is needed to rescue his nation's economy from "the verge of utter catastrophe."

"We are not asking for charity, or expecting philanthropy, but we would like to see our country treated as a partner and a friend," Walesa said in an historic speech to a joint meeting of the House and Senate.

A chorus of "Bravo, Bravo, Bravo," resounded through the jammed House chamber as Walesa made his way to the podium. He stood in silence as the ovation thundered on for seven minutes.

"We, the people. With these words I wish to begin my address," Walesa started out, quoting the U.S. Constitution.

Many members of Congress wore buttons reading "Solidarnosc," the Polish name of the solidarity union movement.

Walesa brought the cheers to their highest pitch when he raised his arms and

Donations to fight hunger

Students asked to give up DC meals

By JIM COHEN
Collegian Staff

By sacrificing one dinner at the dining commons tonight, students at the University of Massachusetts will be able to help the hungry around the world, said Anna Karlsson, coordinator for the University's MassPIRG.

In the 16th annual "Fast For A World Harvest," sponsored by Oxfam America, on-campus students will be able to donate a portion of the cost of their meal to Oxfam by registering at the cashier's desk to miss tonight's meal, she said.

"In previous years, there was not a lot of advertising, so people weren't aware of [Fast For A World Harvest]," she said. "Hopefully it will be a lot more successful this year with the increased advertising."

Several thousand dollars were raised last year, she said.

Donations will go to help Third World countries alleviate hunger through several projects, including well-digging and teaching of farming techniques, she said.

Karlsson added that Oxfam "goes beneath the surface of hunger and helps the people become self-sufficient."

Both on-campus and off-campus students are encouraged to participate, by filling out cards that will be available in the Dining Commons today at lunch.

Cards will not be accepted at dinner tonight, Karlsson said.

A table will be set up outside the Student Union Hatch from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. for off-campus student donations.

Off-campus students can estimate the amount of money they would normally spend for dinner and pledge a donation in that amount, she said.

The fast is part of a week-long effort to increase students' awareness of the Oxfam program, Karlsson said.

Other events will include a video presentation at 11 a.m. today in the Student Union Building.

Kim Davis, an Earth Foods employee, said Earth Foods plans to serve rice and water for free today.

Earth Foods will be accepting donations for Oxfam American and distributing flyers concerning the event, Davis said.

Karlsson said the event is designed to help people "see what it's like to feel hunger, feel the pain, and realize what others go through daily."

Five unions to speak at rally

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Five separate unions from the University of Massachusetts are scheduled to express their support at a noon rally today for the student struggle against further slashes in the state's higher education budget.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors, a labor union representing 1,100 out of 1,300 UMass faculty, is one of the unions sponsoring the rally, said MSP President John Cole, an anthropology professor.

"Certainly a majority of the 1,300 professors are in favor of the strike," said Cole, who is expected to speak at the rally. "I'll be talking to students about what we, as faculty members, have gotten and learned about the student strike."

The rally will be held on the Student Union Ballroom steps.

Also, the Graduate Employee Organization, representing teaching and research assistants will speak at the rally. They voted overwhelmingly yesterday to strike today and tomorrow.

"There is a lack of respect shown for graduate employees by the state," said Renee Heberle, co-spokesperson for GEO.

As a slated speaker, she said she will address the need for stronger graduate assistants' voice in budget procedures for higher education.

Speakers from Local 1776 who represent trades, maintenance, and service employees will also talk at the rally as well as people from Local 509 who represent professional staff.

Members of GEO, and the University Staff Associates/Massachusetts Teacher's Association are also scheduled to speak at the rally.

A shot at the thrills of UMass

I happened to be sitting in class yesterday (please, no rotten eggs), reading the paper before class started, unmindful to what was going on around me.

I failed to notice anything unusual, except for the fact that the student strike was going on, and yet this class was almost completely full, even more so than on a good day.

Jim Clark

Plus, these students didn't look the slightest bit familiar. I began, for some strange reason, to think that I had absentmindedly walked into the wrong classroom, maybe even the wrong building. It wouldn't have been the first time.

Reassuring me though, the professor — the one I expected — walked in. Yes, I was in the right place. Hmm.

"Hi, I'm Prof. So-and-So, and this is Something-or-other 101," he said.

Yup, right class, too. So why the introduction? I checked my watch and my calendar. Uh-huh, Nov. 15. I hadn't lapsed into some silly time warp or something. I was curious, so I tapped the guy sitting next to me on the shoulder.

"Excuse me for being so stupid, but, what's going on here?" I asked.

"Haven't you heard?" he replied.

"No, about what?"

"We're scab students."

Scab students?

My mind quickly took me back to 1987, when the National Football League players went on strike. Rather than postponing the games, the owners went out and found replacement players, many of whom had previously tried out with the teams and didn't make it.

Scab football, it was called. Grotesque stuff, too. But . . . scab students? Verrrrrry interesting.

"So, where do you come from?" I asked.

"We're all students from other colleges, who applied to UMass," he said. "Some of us were put on waiting lists, some of us couldn't afford to come here, and some of us were just flat out rejected — waived during training camp."

I found his last parallel to be a giant coincidence, but I just shrugged it off.

"Forgive me for being naive, but what exactly is the purpose of having replacement students in classes while the real students are out on strike?"

"You wouldn't believe how many students would like to be able to say they attended UMass — even if it's only for a few days," he said. "Look around, we're from all over. Westfield State, UMass-Lowell [oops, not yet], Framingham, Fitchburg, North Adams — even some from community colleges."

So that was it. I knew a guy from my high school who was the quarterback for the St. Louis Cardinals during the strike. Never played another down in the NFL once the strike ended, but the thrill of just getting into a professional football game was incredible for him.

"So this is something you can put on a resume?"

"Sure, don't you think it would look good?" he asked testily. "There's nothing wrong with graduating from Massasoit Community College, or a place like that, but just to say we went to the University of Massachusetts is a tremendous boost."

"So what happens when the strike ends, and the real students come back?" I asked.

"We'll just go back to our regular schools with a new outlook on life, a whole new educational experience."

I finally realized what a privilege it is to be able to attend this school. We shouldn't waste that opportunity by walking out of class, even if it is for a good cause. There are other ways to protest against the budget cuts, but by walking out of classes, we only seem to be defeating our own purpose, which is to get the best education possible.

Notes from the basement

Well, now it is time for us to decide what to take next semester. Remember the forms are due to Whitless (more) by Wednesday the 22nd.

If you have already taken some time to look for new classes, you may have noticed that there aren't that many. Maybe there is no need for a strike, after all next semester there just aren't any classes. Notice there aren't any introductory language classes. I wanted to take Italian 110, guess I better look for another class. Any suggestions?

Well, onto world events. I am so blown away by East Germany. Happy, too. So many German people believed that the Wall would never come down. My friend who has family on the other side can finally go and see them whenever he wants. More importantly, they can see the West side for the first time.

I was watching Friday the 13th, The Series the other night and it really got me to think. The plot was about a 1954 radio, that when installed into a car, could transport the car and driver back to 1954.

What started all this, was that the guy who had the radio was a white supremist, and wanted to go back and be a good ole boy with dad, a KKK member. In other words he was blatantly racist.

The characters were discussing how much progress has been made like: Blacks sit in the front of the bus, drink from the same water fountains, and attend the same schools as Whites.

The good guys pointed out, and rightly so, that though progress has been made, not all the goals have been achieved. Indeed there is damn long road ahead.

Holding on to the real purpose

I took an oath to myself in some kind of twisted, journalistic ritual, that I would not write about the strike. Even as I write, my stomach is gnawing at me, knowing the subject is already as overplayed as Otis Day's version of "Shout" is at most semiformals. Knowing the human mind can rationalize almost anything, I am breaking that vow. There just doesn't seem to be any other campus stuff bigger than the strike.

Josh Galitsky

I have been like many during all this madness, listening, watching and formulating an opinion. I have had to weigh things carefully, being half-out the college door with an empty wallet, and half-in with a desire to graduate. Many eloquent, informative things have been written about needing affordable public education and taxing the big fat bellies of major corporations. I respect people that know their stuff.

Which leads me to the "weak link," if you will, to an otherwise strong chain of hope. There are two groups that I really think take a bite out of the whole effort. The first group are the professional protesters who constantly show themselves at every single solitary campus rally or takeover, regardless it seems, how important it is.

It's like a game of cry wolf and when the "real issues" come along, their impact is drained dramatically. They are the ones who probably initiated redundant chants and cheers like: "Hey Hey, Ho Ho, (fill in the blank) has got to go," and "(The blank space) United, can never be defeated." Every time I hear one of these cheers, I forget which rally I'm at.

The second group are the "glory hogs" who stick their faces in front of every camera like this is Super Bowl weekend. They hold up signs that say things like "Dukakis is the Anti-Christ," and "Get Off Your Ass and Save UMass" (based on the cheer that makes us look like banner waving yahoos). It's sad when you go up to one of these folks and ask them why they are striking and all they can say is that "The legislators are d—ks."

The only other thing I find tough to deal with concerning the strike is that the faculty is so vague about the support they are giving. I hate having to do guesswork on which professors will be willing to "work with me" concerning my absences and which ones can only support me by sending a sympathy card with my grades. The faculty is the key to making this work.

The strike, on the whole, has been excellent. The large numbers that seem to be increasing and the organization under such pressured time constraints has been amazing. It's incredible to see that we can get thousands rallying on the Student Union steps, and alcohol has nothing to do with it. It's encouraging that people still can come out in droves even when their beer privileges are not at stake.

The best thing about the strike is that there are many people who are standing on those picket lines that know what they are talking about. They are new blood and old blood alike who are breathing life into the University and hopefully taking the wind out of those budget cut sails.

Want a little piece of advice from an armchair quarterback? Know exactly why you are out there. For that matter, know why you are not out there. I've seen a lot of rallies come and go and it would be sad to see this one die because people forget why they're standing out in the cold in the first place. My only question is: What happens after Thanksgiving break?

Republican founder supports strike

I am a founding member of the University of Massachusetts Republican Club, its former president and a former Republican candidate for the State Legislature. I am presently working on a PhD in Political Science. I urge that students from all points on the political spectrum take a stand for UMass and join the strike until tomorrow.

While I had initially opposed the strike, it has proven effective in attracting attention to the plight of the university in Boston.

If the striking peeters out, then we will be sending exactly the wrong message to Beacon Hill. We will be saying that we really do not care about our university. The strike must be sustained, and preferably strengthened for the remainder of the week. Tomorrow should be a crescendo of protest, not a whimper of resignation.

This must be a time of unity, not divisiveness. Someone at Tuesday's Graduate Student Senate meeting used the budget crisis as an excuse to bash Republicans and Citizens for Limited Taxation.

In fact, if the Legislature had been listening to these groups over the past few years and had heeded their warnings of oncoming fiscal disaster, we wouldn't be in this current fiscal mess. But now is not the time to cast blame. Now is the time to stand together.

Moderate and conservative students need not feel uncomfortable striking. Over past years, many resources have been invested in the University of Massachusetts. Funds have poured in and talented people have come to study and teach here. These have been successful investments in the reputation and prestige of UMass. Today, our investments are being seriously risked as the University becomes an increasingly unattractive place for quality faculty.

It is clear that some students can afford to pay more, and most of us are reasonable enough to bear our fair share of the burden, but without maintenance of judicious short-term state funding, our school will be ruined. The devastation of the University of Massachusetts is totally unacceptable. I love UMass and am going to do whatever I can to save it. How about you?

Do your part for democracy

Last weekend was tough.

Who would have thought I'd be seven for seven, covering the spread on all my college and pro selections, at 4:23 p.m. Sunday afternoon. And who would have thought, with $500 waiting for me in the wings, that the Phoenix Cardinals would choose to run out the clock instead of taking it in for a final six against the lowly Dallas Cowboys, thereby rendering my impressive handicapping performance useless.

Cosmo Macero Jr.

24-20 I believe the final score was, and with it I came crashing down from a sportsman's level comparable with say . . . a Lou Holtz or a Barry Switzer, to the second-rate status of a Ray Perkins or Sam Rutigliano (more on him next week). Definitely a tough weekend. 500 bucks must be good for at least a credit or two around here, wouldn't you say?

Manager's Official Strike Commentary

I'm tired of estimating numbers, but however many thousand strikers have been manning the picket lines this week, they should all be showered with praise and thanks for making a genuine effort to preserve our dying education. The numbers seem to be growing everyday.

Hey, how about that fist logo we've been using? Pretty militant if you ask me.

I talked to Rep. Chester Suhuski (D-Gardner) yesterday. He was concerned about how students were interpreting his brilliant statements in yesterday's paper. I assured him his newly earned status as jackass of the week was intact.

This, of course, brings us to the official, Damned Fool Quote Of The Month for November:

"The student strike is a lot of sound and fury signifying nothing."

— Rep. Chester Suhuski

Not only did Mr. Suhuski insult and infuriate 25,000 people with one flap of his toungue, he had to rip off the title of a fine William Faulkner novel to get his stupid point across.

What kind of a town is Gardner anyway? Just a stop on Route 2 if you ask me. Kind of like Harvard . . .

I was waiting at the bus stop the other day, and this guy was standing with a list of state representatives, asking passersby if they had called or written theirs. It was sad enough that most didn't know who theirs was, but it was far more pathetic that a large percentage of the folks didn't even care, and some, in fact, acted as if the poor fellow was a nutcase.

I'll be the first to admit that I loathe my rep. (Mary Jane Gibson, D-Belmont) because of her sickly adherence to the tiresome liberal paradigm. However, I dropped her a line and let her know how I felt about the budget crisis because she (gulp) represents my district. The guy in the Student Union says it everyday, "Fight the budget cuts with tax reform, put tax reform on the ballot."

There's only one way to develop a progressive tax package that will salvage higher education without forcing big business to head for NH . . . participate in the democratic process, and put the pressure on your representative. Any republican will agree with that. I should know . . . I am one. (How's that grab you, Leavitt?)

We need to use our power

By now, most of us have formed an opinion about the strike. Some people are strong supporters and have been picketing every day. Others are unsure, feeling torn between an obligation to their classes and to fellow students. But among the diversity of opinions, there is a common ground which we all can agree on.

We all support public higher education.

Minu Sebastian

If we didn't, then we wouldn't be here. We work hard in our classes and many of us also hold jobs to put our way through school. We know getting an education is vital to our future as individuals and informed citizens of the commonwealth.

So how can we show support for our school and our futures without compromising our education at the present time?

Yesterday, I went to the Statehouse hoping to get some of my questions answered.

I went with a lobby group of 32 people organized by SGA members, John Dunlap and Jason Kofman. The day began with a meeting with Representative Stan Rosenberg who informed us of the present activities in the House of Representatives.

Rosenberg has prepared two pending amendments, one of which will be voted on by the House of Representatives in the near future.

The first amendment states the need for $25 million to be restored to higher education. The second amendment calls for the need to restore funds, but also has a tax package attached and declares public higher education in a state of emergency.

The problem with the first amendment is that even if it passes, there is no money at the present time to put towards public higher education. On the other hand, the second amendment calls for the need of a tax package which could generate the revenue that public higher education needs. Rosenberg is more inclined to propose the second amendment.

We need to call or write to our representatives now to encourage them to vote in favor of the amendment proposed by Rosenberg. This amendment is vital to the future of UMass and other state schools. It is absolutely necessary that we all do our part in advocating the amendment.

We need to contact our parents and friends and tell them to also put pressure on their representatives and senators. The main objective of our contact with our legislators is to communicate the need for an increase in taxes.

A progressive income tax is one route that our legislators could take. This would take more money from those who could afford it and less from those who belong to low income groups.

At this point, our state's deficit cannot be remedied without some kind of tax reform. We must show our support for an increase in taxes if we want more money to be put into public higher education and social services.

There are certain 'target" representatives who have been known to swing in favor of public higher education. We need to focus our attention to these people. There will be a table set up today in the Student Union Ballroom so that students can write to their representatives. There will also be a list of the 'target" representatives available.

The time has come for us to use our power to get what we need.

Many of us do not know how our government works or how decisions are made. It is important to educate ourselves. We need to ask questions, stay aware and voice our concerns to our legislators.

Collectively, we need to show our legislators that we care about our futures and the future of public higher education.

We do have the power to make a difference.

Letters to the Editor

Different routes

Though I supported the Boston rally and the writing of letters to representatives as appropriate methods of protesting the budget cuts, I can't support this strike. The legislature wants to dismantle UMass. What do we do? We help them. Who do we hurt? Us.

Does the state care about negative publicity or, for that matter, do they care what anybody thinks?

I understand our problem: We've tried almost everything else. We need to channel the energy that this strike has mustered and use it where it will do some good. Hit them where it hurts. Take it to Boston again, picket the Statehouse, the restaurants where the state senators eat lunch. Shut down the Massachusetts Turnpike. Refuse to pay taxes, state fees and tolls on the Pike (they can't arrest you). Flood your hometown newspapers with letters urging these same actions.

The time has come for real action. It's obvious that nothing else will work. A few picket signs on the six o'clock news is getting mundane. Wimpy protests in our own backyard is wasted energy. Nobody here needs convincing.

Just a brief note

The Thanksgiving holiday break is only a few days away. When you go home — out of Amherst — please ask your family and friends to write a letter, or a brief note, to a Massachusetts state representative, asking them to support public higher education in Massachusetts. We have the support of Amherst representatives. Now we need our voices heard outside of Amherst. Our letter/postcard efforts here are great — but I envision our letters going into a big round file labeled "Those kids from Amherst." We need our message heard from other points in the state. Even if you are not a Massachusetts resident, a plea to a rep can't hurt — let them know you care, too.

How much time does it take to write:

"TO:

FROM: Public higher education can suffer no more cuts. Please support us." (If you are a registered voter, let them know.) Keep registering to vote. There is hope.

Student support comes in different forms

Armbands, cardboard slogans, rallies — yes, the strike against the UMass budget cuts is definitely underway. In a campus of 20,000 students, there will obviously be diversity of opinion over how to deal with the crisis of the cuts.

Two organizations have formed: the Union of Undergraduates who advocate the strike and the Scabs who ardently oppose it. There are many other students who are attending classes, yet supporting the strike when they aren't in class.

I saw a negative and disturbing aspect of the strike — students disintegrating into an "us and them" mindset among each other.

My Math 121 class was interrupted by someone from the Union of Undergraduates, urging us to leave class and attend the 11:30 a.m. rally. I respect his viewpoint and his right to express it, but I became justifiably furious as he began to question our intelligence when no one budged from their seats.

He implied that we were in class because we aren't aware of the implications of the budget cuts. I'm sure everyone in my class and on this campus has to be fully aware of the cuts and their implications via the incredible effort made to inform people. There are Collegian articles, ubiquitous signs, publicized organizational meetings and information distributed throughout the dorms. Many students who are concerned and aware, are choosing to attend class. Yet when out of the classroom, they are writing and calling representatives and senators, registering to vote, signing petitions and participating in rallies and pickets.

To make the strike work, students must band together and respect each other's choices, encouraging each other to support the strike as much as possible. By questioning someone's intelligence or loyalty because they are sitting in class, is unfair and creates pointless rifts among students when we should be pulling together. The only way the strike will have a positive affect is if we respect and encourage each other. Dividing the 20,000 of us will only weaken our cause.

'Cult of personalities' misinterpret elections

This is with reference to the article by Pratip Dastidar and Sumantra Bose on the India elections ("India: One-fifth of humanity goes to the polls," Nov. 10). We take exception to their condescending tone and their unwillingness or inability to present a balanced and objective picture. They seem to belong to the cult of personalities who excel in cynicism and mindless criticism.

Let us first appreciate the fact that India is a democracy and has been one since its independence in 1947. It is no mean thing that a nearly 500 million strong electorate will get to choose their next government. This is more than can be said for many other countries.

It cannot be denied that ideally India (or any other country for that matter) should not squander precious resources on defense build-up. However, it is hardly an ideal world — certainly not around India.

India has fought three wars in its young life, of 42 years as a nation, and in none of these was it the aggressor. The percentage of GNP that it spends on defense is lower than that of its neighbors Pakistan and China.

Moreover, if its traditionally hostile neighbors have nuclear capability, it can hardly be expected to shun the same. As for the "economic blockade" of Nepal, let it not be forgotten that Nepal has been the recipient of decades of huge economic aid from India. If Nepal should suddenly go hobnobbing with a hostile neighbor, then it has no business expecting continued preferential treatment from India.

Most of us were dismayed at the idea of Indian soldiers dying in Sri-Lanka, fighting a dirty war which was not ours. However, it must be remembered that India was invited by the Sri-Lankan government to help stop a bloody civil war and ethnic strife in which people of Indian origin were involved.

While we are not apologists for Rajiv Gandhi's ruling party, we do agree with his economic liberalization and his moving towards private enterprise. It is not what we would call "a legacy of designer sunglasses and PC clones."

Perhaps Bose and Dastidar would have us move back 50 years to the glorious days of scarcities and inefficiencies of centralized planning, to days when it was necessary to wade through an inordinate amount of paper work in order to complete a transaction instead of using computers.

Finally, we respect the rights of Bose and Dastidar to predict future scenarios in their negative fashion. But we wish to emphasize that they do not speak for any of us.

New York's Knitting hits the Valley, sort of

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Valley Jazz

As you may recall from this column three weeks ago, the Knitting Factory club in New York represents today's most important new music scene. What will happen to it and its' musicians is a fascinating question. One of the barometers for judging this is A&M Records' occasional Live at the Knitting Factory anthologies, of which the latest is Volume 2.

The idea of an established major label taking an active interest in an avant-garde music scene is remarkable but not new: ABC created its Impulse subsidiary to record music of the free jazz revolution in the 1960's. The latest Impulse reissue sampler, Fire Into Music, does a surprisingly good job of covering that period. Such exposure is good for the musicians, of course, but there is always a worry that it will "corrupt" the music (like Department of Defense money corrupting scientific research, maybe?)

Thus, one would suspect that A&M is trying to make "Knitting Factory music" (whatever that means...) as accessible as possible through their compilation albums. This is the usual role of anthologies and "greatest hits" collections, but it works best when there are also full albums by each of the represented artists available for those who wish to dig deeper. This isn't the case here; for those of us who can't make it down to lower Manhattan on a regular basis, there is only the weekly radio series that airs locally on WMUA. A few of the artists who play the club have albums released, but they tend to be on small labels and thus are hard to find.

That aside, Live at the Knitting Factory, Vol. 2 conveys the range and depth of this music better than its predecessor, which concentrated too much on fusion-related material. As much as I hate musical labels, I will try to give some idea of what's on this album. There are a couple of covers: Odd Job gives a raucous, lumbering version of Hendrix's "Foxy Lady," which features Shelley Hirsch's banshee vocals. Gary Lucas covers "Ghosts" by free-jazz tenor saxophonist Albert Ayler (who, ironically, recorded for Impulse) on National steel guitar(!); like Ayler's, Lucas' version takes Delta blues into Parts Unknown.

Elsewhere, there is percussion-based avant-pop from Chunk; mannered free-form improvisation from Ikue Mori, Fred Frith and Mark Dresser; hard-hitting, noisy fusion from guitarist Sonny Sharrock; interesting percussion/synth work from Joey Baron; Eastern-influenced music from percussionist Glen Velez and friends; avant-scratching from D.J. Chistian Marclay; and more.

Judging from this album and from the latest installments in the Live at the Knitting Factory radio series, the Knitting Factory scene is beginning to coalesce into a movement. There is a core group of musicians who are involved in many of the bands that perform there (including saxophonist Ned Rothenburg, percussionist Sam Bennett and keyboardist Wayne Horvitz); not surprisingly, the sounds of these bands show some similarities.

The good news is that they seem to be converging on a geniunely new sound. It does not fit any labels like "fusion" or "world beat." In general, it's got a hard-edged, nervy quality that I can only describe as quintessentially New York — the same quality that distinguished New York bebop from its counterparts across the country (especially on the west coast). Also, in case you didn't notice, there is an emphasis on percussion. So far, the Knitting Factory sound has not been watered down or commercialized. Let's hope that A&M's interest in this music doesn't contaminate it.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): A new understanding with loved one gets your day off to a promising start. Tend to old business before committing yourself to anything new. Socializing may take precedence over romance tonight.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Do not overpower your associates or they will resent you. Seek a compromise over finances. Consider a proposal made by a family member. Loan applications have a good chance for approval.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Anything you write today should be well-received. Boost your income with innovative ideas. You find a better way to do your job; try to convince those in power to let you follow your instincts.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A touch of mystery makes romance exciting. A member of the opposite sex could be setting you up for a fall. Be careful. You will be happily surprised if you enter a contest.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Do not let yourself be caught up in matters that loved ones must solve for themselves. A legal issue could be resolved in your favor if you move swiftly. Take experts with you.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): Discuss investments with a stockbroker or accountant. Shopping bargains abound, but examine merchandise carefully. A fun-loving friend brings more balance to your life.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Learn to recognize promising trends in business or finance. Adhering to old-fashioned methods will deplete your profits. Control a tendency to be demanding now or risk losing a friend or lover.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): The possibility of buying land in a distant place intrigues you. Family and business associates urge you to make decisions too quickly. Refuse to be stampeded. Avoid upsetting a neighbor.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21): Become more practical. Keep a tighter rein on office gossip and spending. Although a job offer is tempting, you might do better staying put. A calm partner will bring you great happiness.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Your income gets a boost, thanks to overseas interests. Your popularity is a factor in your business success. Community service proves rewarding. Get your friends and neighbors involved.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): An idea of yours that was opposed by an authority figure will be reviewed. Work harder to impress a difficult member of the opposite sex. Your popularity grows. Romance will be sweet.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): A great day for family and community affairs. A domestic exchange could be involved. Compete routine chores before starting a new project. At home entertainment is favored tonight.

Speaker: Government suppresses UFO data

By DAVID FORRESTER
Collegian Correspondent

Stories about aliens from another world and Unidentified Flying Objects may seem like practical jokes, science-fiction writing, or paranoid delusions, but according to a UFO researcher, it may be more fact than fiction.

"It's a hell of a lot closer to the truth than what your government has been telling you,"said Robert Hastings, a professed UFO witness who spoke Tuesday about the hidden history of UFOs as part of the University's Distinguished Visitors Program.

He told the audience he obtained government documents that support his belief that UFOs exist and are not simply fodder for publications like the National Enquirer.

Hastings said previously classified government documents, which were made public in the 1970s through the Freedom of Information Act, corroborate many eyewitness accounts of UFO sightings but the government has kept this information from people.

"A wealth of information in the public domain says the government has been covering it up," he said.

Hastings, who travels the country lecturing on UFO-related topics, said he is part of a "grassroots public information program."

He is not trying to turn UFO skeptics into believers; instead, he wants to present part of more than 8,000 pages of CIA, Air Force, and other government agencies' documentation and let people decide for themselves, he said.

Hastings claimed that Project Bluebook, an Air Force project that researched UFO sighting claims, was not the only government investigation into the subject. This is despite a public statement at the close of Project Bluebook in 1969 that said the government has no further interest in UFOs.

"The CIA has directed overall policy since 1953," Hastings said. Declassified CIA documents explain the reasons for the coverup, he said.

Hastings showed several slides which he said depicted CIA memorandum that stated the purpose of their UFO policy is "to minimize concern and pains" among the general public.

"The government fears the unpredictability of public response," he said. He empathizes with the CIA and the government on their unwillingness to produce mass hysteria, but he added that he feels people would react more calmly if people in the government gave a candid announcement of what they knew.

A factor which Hastings said he feels supports the notion that people are ready for a full disclosure is a recent Gallop poll which said 59 percent of Americans believe in UFOs.

"One way or another, the government will not be able to suppress the information forever," Hastings said.

Videos to teach about priorities

By WILLIAM FLEISHMAN
Collegian Staff

As students battle to balance their time between homework and activities such as the strike, a residential area is offering a workshop on time management.

The workshop is a multi-media presentation titled "Zen and the Art of Time Management," which will focus on different ways students can take charge of their lives.

The event, which will be held tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the basement of Brett House in Room B-34, will blend Eastern philosophy and study skills, said Dr. Ted Slovin, coordinator of the workshop and associate director of the Center for Counseling and Academic Development.

After the presentation, students will be able to discuss their problems with time management.

"We look at students with normal problems such as career choices, stress and time management, interpersonal relationships, divorces, and academic difficulties and do the best we can," said Slovin. The program will include a video titled "Time of Your Life," as well as an Eastern approach to time management through the late Elda Hartley film, "Zen and Now."

"The workshop will offer a variety of ways to establish priorities, and establishing priorities is the key to effective time management," Slovin said.

"Just because they are conservative doesn't give them the right to be criminals." Chambers said after the verdict. Smith added, "Finally [Rothman] has been held accountable."

All three co-defendants were found innocent of civil rights violations, which Smith and Chambers also brought against them. Another student, Alan Brynjholfsson, was acquitted on all charges.

Rothman, Darling and Dratch assaulted Smith and Chambers while the two were delivering copies of The Liberator, a liberal newspaper they had helped publish, according to testimony.

Rothman testified that he had received a phone call from a friend informing him of the Liberator's existence, and another phone call threatening his life.

At that point, he and his friends proceeded to campus to find a copy of The Liberator, he said. "I was very, very depressed. I was upset. I can remember trembling," Rothman told the court.

Upon reading the newspaper, they said they tried to find the distributors of the paper to ask them to discontinue distribution.

They eventually found Chambers and Smith in Smith's car behind Van Meter in Central, according to testimony. Rothman testified that Darling stopped their car and he, Dratch, and Steven Lutz got out of Darling's car and approached Smith's.

Smith and Chambers rolled up their windows and locked the doors as the three others approached their car, rapping on the windows and attempting to open the doors, according to testimony.

Smith and Chambers then drove to the Amherst Police station but were pursued by the assailants. Rothman and the others exited their vehicle and attempted to converse with Smith and Chambers, who blew the horn of their vehicle in an attempt to get the attention of the police, and at this point Rothman and his friends left, according to testimony.

"I will not vote for a tax package that does not include restoration of money to public higher education," Rosenberg said. "There isn't anybody who could possibly believe we can close this deficit ($700 million) without a tax package."

The lobbiers received unanimous legislative support for public higher education, but were faced with some representatives who did not feel their constituents would approve new taxes. Some said there is state waste and inefficiency and additional administration cuts that could possibly be made.

Rep. Carol C. Cleven, (R-Chelmsford), said she has always supported education and believes there is a need for a compromise between increased taxes and budgetary cuts.

"I've never been afraid to vote for taxes," Cleven said. "Get parents to support new taxes. I'm not hearing from those people."

Asst. Majority Whip Mary Jane Gibson, (D-Belmont), said there is waste to be cut but also said at some point new tax revenues must be generated. She said would vote with Rosenberg once there is a majority vote for taxes.

"We need a combination of cuts and taxes that 81 representatives can agree to," Gibson said. Eighty one is the majority needed to pass a bill.

Kofman spoke with Rep. Mary Jane McKenna, (R-Holden), who said she supports higher education, but did not support new taxes. UMass student Caroline West met with Rep. Patricia A. Walrath (D-Stow) who said she supported higher public education but was following her constituents' requests for no new taxes. She said she had received far fewer letters from UMass students than from her constituents.

livable wage," she said. "We can't continue to function on the stipends that are being offered. The only way to improve our situation is to organize."

Provost Richard O'Brien said the administration does not support the teaching assistant strike.

"Our job as a university is to teach any student who comes here to be taught," he said.

Carol Knox, vice president of District 65 of the United Auto Workers, said teaching and research assistants are not violating any law or contractual agreement by striking. They are not considered state or employees and therefore state labor laws do not apply, she said.

The United Auto Workers District 65 is helping the GEO organize.

Young Reds surpassed all expectations

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was given as much as a snowball's chance in hell before the start of the season by the critics. They said it was to be an 'off year' for the traditionally strong Reds, after returning three starters.

But UMass proved those critics wrong, finishing the 1989 campaign with a 12-4-4 record and as NCAA quarterfinalists.

Most people knew about the Reds' All-American, midfielder April Kater. But they forgot about Mary Curtis. And Sarah Szetela. And Colette Bowler. And Becky Bonzano. And Kim Montgomery. And Robin Runstein. And Sue Gaudette. And Margie Jaede. And Michele Woodside. And Tracy Arwood.

"They knew we had [Kater], knew she could jump and that she was a quality player," head coach Jim Rudy said. "On paper, we really didn't have anybody else — she was our one visible player."

Kater topped the scoring charts with 11 goals and nine assists, and worked well with Gaudette (9-11-29) up front to form a formidable duo. The two Woodys, Woodside and Arwood, were capable substitutes in the midfield, with Woodside scoring clutch goals against Connecticut, Central Florida and Virginia.

Bowler was a pleasant surprise who started every game in a remarkable turnaround after not playing much last year. Runstein was a tactically valuable forward who was denied a chance to shine in the playoffs by an ankle injury. Jaede began the season as a defender, but proved to be a valuable pressurizing forward by year's end.

Curtis got some justice after waiting three years to play, and was the beneficiary of some great defense. Montgomery did a great job sweeping, and was ably supported by Bonzano and Szetela. "I will say those 10 people who didn't get any respect, they certainly earned it now. Our freshmen did very well for us, but ultimately it was the returning people who carried us."

Two of those frosh, Kim Eynard and Leanne Swartz, showed the flair to be big-time scorers. Eynard finished third in scoring (9-3-21) and Swartz's speed will always keep her in plays. Earlier in the season when midfielder Lisa Mickelson was healthy, Rudy had said she had the potential to be the next April Kater, with sound heading skills and a solid boot from either foot.

Holly Hellmuth and Skye Eddy have "All-American" written all over them. Hellmuth was a gritty defender who rarely made a mistake, and Rudy said, "We think Skye will be one of the better goalkeepers that'll end up playing here."

"Our freshmen got enough time to really put them into great shape for next year," Rudy said. "I think they've done well and I think they've learned a bunch and improved a lot.

"I'm really pleased — it's one of the best freshman classes I've ever recruited. And I like them a lot as people — which I think is most important — and they're pretty good darn players."

A tough schedule containing 10 Top 20 teams helped propel the Reds into the playoffs, but it was the character and chemistry that kept UMass together as a winning unit.

"This is a dedicated group of people who do the right things," Rudy said. "You don't have to remind them, push them or threaten them about staying in shape, eating right, drinking, smoking or partying. They do the right things.

"Because of the commitment and personalities, we had very few things that existed on most teams — the cliques, the social groups and the personality clashes. And if there were any, they would have worked on it to get it right."

Rudy feels that after the freshmen have tasted UMass' winning ways, it is up to them to carry on the torch.

"That's the challenge to our freshman class, which is the first group I recruited here," Rudy said. "Now that they know what the UMass tradition is, it's up to them to culture it — they're the gardeners of our tradition. It's up to them to nurture the garden to do the right things to make sure the crops are plentiful."

Losing only three seniors (Curtis, Szetela and Bowler), the Reds return an all-around talented squad that is hungry for a shot at the national title after a year of eating most opponents up.

"We have high hopes for next year," Rudy said. "Our season this year reminded me of that [Lays] potato chip commerical, 'I betcha you can't only eat one.' We got one — that was getting into the playoffs — and we ate that one. Then all of a sudden, we wanted to eat more than one. We wanted Colorado and the Final Four, and that was all reachable."

The offseason during the spring will be an important time for the Reds to improve on a strong foundation set this year. "It's critical," Rudy said. "When you're not fully-funded and going up against teams that has more scholarship monies that you, your development and education become the steak and potatoes of your program."

After his second season, Rudy feels he has found a home at UMass, and the direction he has given to the women's soccer program has been invaluable.

"I really enjoy being here," Rudy said. "I'm flattered by the types of people I'm getting to coach and I really appreciate the support we get — some of it's emotional, some of it's visual, some of it's financial.

"When you have the dean [David Bischoff], the football coach [Jim Reid], the basketball coach [John Calipari], a former basketball coach [Jack Leaman], and all the other coaches coming in wishing you good luck and congratulating you, that makes this job worthwhile.

"I'm at the right place and at the right school."

Freshmen brighten future for field hockey

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

If this year was any kind of indication of things to come for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, strap yourselves in. It's going to be a long ride.

A large part of the success of the Minutewomen this year was due to a very strong freshman class. Without the play of Kathy Phelan, Sherlan Cabralis, Phillipa Scott and Susan Bernegger toward the end of the season, UMass may never have reached the second round of the NCAA tournament.

Scott, a goaltender, may be the find of the bunch. She took over the starting goalie position in the second game from sophomore Lisa Charron, and started the remaining 21 games.

A native of Corsham, England, Scott is a member of England's National Under-21 team. But there is no doubt how much she meant to this year's 15-6-2 UMass team, leading the Atlantic 10 Conference with a 0.40 goals against average (0.75 overall).

"Scotty has just gone far beyond my expectations," Hixon said. "I knew that she was good and would help us but I certainly didn't think she would contribute as she's done."

Phelan won a start in the all-important midfield which in the end may have been the reason why UMass went as far in the NCAA tourney as they did. Her value became evident in mid season when Phelan shut down Temple's All-American forward, Jane Catanzaro.

"Kathy Phelan had been in there contributing substantially until she got hurt," Hixon said. With about two weeks left in the season, Phelan developed stress fractures in her legs and missed the remainder of the regular season. She saw spot action in the Atlantic 10 tournament and the NCAA tourney, where UMass beat Boston University, 1-0 before losing to Old Dominion, 2-1.

Cabralis, a 23 year-old from Trinidad, won a starting midfielder's spot and became a mainstay in the middle of the field. She was often one of the players to get the ball up the field to the forwards so that they had chances to score. She finished the season with four assists, but probably helped create a lot more goals than that total may show.

Bernegger did not score a goal this year but the fact that Hixon inserted her in many crucial situations shows the kind of confidence the 11th-year coach had in her.

"I think Sue Bernegger has emerged as a player of the future," Hixon said. "She's got good speed and she's smart. I think Sue will get better with a little more physical strength.

"Those kids (Phelan, Bernegger, Joy Blennis) are good," Hixon said. "There's no doubt about it. Underneath them there is a freshman class that people haven't even seen yet. That I think will be very strong contributors next year and the following year. So I think our foundation is with that first-year class."

But ultimately, it was the mix of the younger players with the veterans that landed the Minutewomen in the NCAA tournament for the 10th time in the last 11 years.

"I think the kids who are sophomores and juniors this year will be so much better next year for their experience this year, so I think we've got a very good balance for the upcoming few seasons," Hixon said.

Junior Kerri Fagan became the team leader in the defensive end from her sweeper position. She and Scott frustrated the heck out of opposing offenses throughout the season.

"Kerri Fagan in the sweeper position was outstanding," Hixon said. "She really gave us so much."

Junior defender Lisa Berardinelli also became a stopper in the backfield by season's end. She dogged Catanzaro all over the field in the Atlantic 10 tourney while Phelan was out. She shut down BU's Lisa Brone in the NCAA tournament.

"After Kathy Phelan got hurt, we had to rely on Lisa Berardinelli at that center back position and I think Lisa responded really well," Hixon said.

The biggest adjustment during the season was in the midfield. Senior Kathy DeAngelis, the team's leading scorer, switched from her forward spot to the midfield in the second weekend of the season. But the points still came for DeAngelis, who ended up with 15 goals and three assists.

Junior Beth Thornton was the final piece to the midfield. She scored six goals and two assists, including the lone goal in UMass' playoff loss to ODU.

"Those kids did a great job," Hixon said. "They really started to handle the ball a lot more which is really what you need."

Without DeAngelis, the forward line was junior Mara Frattasio and sophomore Dawn Trumbauer. Frattasio had the biggest year of her college career so far with 13 goals and one assist, while Trumbauer scored six goals and four assists in her second season as a starting forward.

"Mara has been the most productive of our forwards," Hixon said. "We moved Dawn out of the middle because we needed to have someone to keep the ball on the field and she certainly did that for us."

Scoring really was a weakness for the Minutewomen this year, though. Without Scott, UMass could have been in trouble.

"I think our forwards need an off-season to develop some physical strength and some tricks of the trade now that they know they are playing, so that next year they can be that much better than they are now and we'll have a real cohesive unit on that front line," Hixon said.

There are also some pretty good memories from the past four years, including four NCAA tournaments. Four seniors will be graduating this year. And they will be sorely missed.

The scoring punch by DeAngelis, an All-American from Lexington and a member of the national reserve team, has not been matched by anyone over the past three years in a UMass uniform.

"Kathy really had done it all on the field for our team," Hixon said.

Senior right back Carol Smith is the iron woman of the class, the only UMass player to start every game the last four years.

"Smitty has been our most consistent player without any stats," Hixon said. "Smitty really understands the game well and I think she helps Kerri [Fagan] and Bernie [Martel] and Lisa [Berardinelli] really bring the defense together because of her knowledge of the game."

Martel also was a main ingredient in UMass' defense this season. "She probably had the most difficult defensive assignment every game," Hixon said. "I think the majority of the times, Bernie responded really well. She is a very hard worker, nobody works harder."

Kathey Derwin was the only senior who did not see a lot of playing time this year. But in Hixon's eyes, Derwin, a 1989 academic All-American as an engineering major, was the biggest factor in the success of the Minutewomen this year.

"I know that I could not have brought this team together without Kathey Derwin," Hixon said. "She was our team tutor. She was our team therapist. She was our team cheerleader. Probably the only word to describe her is inspirational. She will probably be the individual that we miss the most."

Young Reds surpassed all expectations

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was given as much as a snowball's chance in hell before the start of the season by the critics. They said it was to be an 'off year' for the traditionally strong Reds, after returning three starters.

But UMass proved those critics wrong, finishing the 1989 campaign with a 12-4-4 record and as NCAA quarterfinalists.

Most people knew about the Reds' All-American, midfielder April Kater. But they forgot about Mary Curtis. And Sarah Szetela. And Colette Bowler. And Becky Bonzano. And Kim Montgomery. And, Robin Runstein. And Sue Gaudette. And Margie Jaede. And Michele Woodside. And Tracy Arwood.

"They knew we had [Kater], knew she could jump and that she was a quality player," head coach Jim Rudy said. "On paper, we really didn't have anybody else — she was our one visible player."

Kater topped the scoring charts with 11 goals and nine assists, and worked well with Gaudette (9-11-29) up front to form a formidable duo. The two Woodys, Woodside and Arwood, were capable substitutes in the midfield, with Woodside scoring clutch goals against Connecticut, Central Florida and Virginia.

Bowler was a pleasant surprise who started every game in a remarkable turnaround after not playing much last year. Runstein was a tactically valuable forward who was denied a chance to shine in the playoffs by an ankle injury. Jaede began the season as a defender, but proved to be a valuable pressurizing forward by year's end.

Curtis got some justice after waiting three years to play, and was the beneficiary of some great defense. Montgomery did a great job sweeping, and was ably supported by Bonzano and Szetela. "I will say those 10 people who didn't get any respect, they certainly earned it now. Our freshmen did very well for us, but ultimately it was the returning people who carried us."

Two of those frosh, Kim Eynard and Leanne Swartz, showed the flair to be big-time scorers. Eynard finished third in scoring (9-3-21) and Swartz's speed will always keep her in plays. Earlier in the season when midfielder Lisa Mickelson was healthy, Rudy had said she had the potential to be the next April Kater, with sound heading skills and a solid boot from either foot.

Holly Hellmuth and Skye Eddy have "All-American" written all over them. Hellmuth was a gritty defender who rarely made a mistake, and Rudy said, "We think Skye will be one of the better goalkeepers that'll end up playing here."

"Our freshmen got enough time to really put them into great shape for next year," Rudy said. "I think they've done well and I think they've learned a bunch and improved a lot.

"I'm really pleased — it's one of the best freshman classes I've ever recruited. And I like them a lot as people — which I think is most important — and they're pretty good darn players."

A tough schedule containing 10 Top 20 teams helped propel the Reds into the playoffs, but it was the character and chemistry that kept UMass together as a winning unit.

"This is a dedicated group of people who do the right things," Rudy said. "You don't have to remind them, push them or threaten them about staying in shape, eating right, drinking, smoking or partying. They do the right things.

"Because of the commitment and personalities, we had very few things that existed on most teams — the cliques, the social groups and the personality clashes. And if there were any, they would have worked on it to get it right."

Rudy feels that after the freshmen have tasted UMass' winning ways, it is up to them to carry on the torch.

"That's the challenge to our freshman class, which is the first group I recruited here," Rudy said. "Now that they know what the UMass tradition is, it's up to them to culture it — they're the gardeners of our tradition. It's up to them to nurture the garden to do the right things to make sure the crops are plentiful."

Losing only three seniors (Curtis, Szetela and Bowler), the Reds return an all-around talented squad that is hungry for a shot at the national title after a year of eating most opponents up.

"We have high hopes for next year," Rudy said. "Our season this year reminded me of that [Lays] potato chip commerical, 'I betcha you can't only eat one.' We got one — that was getting into the playoffs — and we ate that one. Then all of a sudden, we wanted to eat more than one. We wanted Colorado and the Final Four, and that was all reachable."

The offseason during the spring will be an important time for the Reds to improve on a strong foundation set this year. "It's critical," Rudy said. "When you're not fully-funded and going up against teams that has more scholarship monies that you, your development and education become the steak and potatoes of your program."

After his second season, Rudy feels he has found a home at UMass, and the direction he has given to the women's soccer program has been invaluable.

"I really enjoy being here," Rudy said. "I'm flattered by the types of people I'm getting to coach and I really appreciate the support we get — some of it's emotional, some of it's visual, some of it's financial.

"When you have the dean [David Bischoff], the football coach [Jim Reid], the basketball coach [John Calipari], a former basketball coach [Jack Leaman], and all the other coaches coming in wishing you good luck and congratulating you, that makes this job worthwhile.

Freshmen brighten future for field hockey

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

If this year was any kind of indication of things to come for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, strap yourselves in. It's going to be a long ride.

A large part of the success of the Minutewomen this year was due to a very strong freshman class. Without the play of Kathy Phelan, Sherlan Cabralis, Phillipa Scott and Susan Bernegger toward the end of the season, UMass may never have reached the second round of the NCAA tournament.

Scott, a goaltender, may be the find of the bunch. She took over the starting goalie position in the second game from sophomore Lisa Charron, and started the remaining 21 games.

A native of Corsham, England, Scott is a member of England's National Under-21 team. But there is no doubt how much she meant to this year's 15-6-2 UMass team, leading the Atlantic 10 Conference with a 0.40 goals against average (0.75 overall).

Portnoy harps on the blues

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Staff

This Saturday night, Chicago bluesman Jerry Portnoy will be bringing his wailing harp and harmonica to Pearl Street in Northampton. He and his latest band, the Streamliners, will be performing to benefit WMUA 91.1 FM.

Jerry Portnoy has been part of the blues scene, and considered its greatest harpist, since the early 70's. During this time he played with the best of the best. He has shared the stage with Eric Clapton, Bonnie Raitt, Johnny Winter, the Blues Brothers, George Harrison, the Rolling Stones and Dizzy Gillespie. He also spent six years with the Muddy Waters Blues Band. His last bit, with a band before the Streaminers, was with Ronnie Earl and the Broadcasters, which ended in March. Portnoy has played in this area many times at the Iron Horse and Sheehan's, and opened for the Jeff Healy Band at Pearl Street.

Having grown up in Chicago, Portnoy was heavily influenced by the Chicago blues scene. He grew up listening to blues greats like Little Walter play on street corners. Some of his main influences were Big Walter Horton and musicians such as Muddy Waters' bands.

Oddly enough, Portnoy, who did not pick up the harp until he turned 25, is not able to typify his sound. He said, "I learned a whole bunch of stuff and listened to a bunch of guys. Now when I get up there I just play."

"I want to carve out my little niche," he said about his part in the blues scene today. "Blues is never going to go away and there will always be a following. I'm going to keep on doing what I have been doing."

That means playing the blues. Portnoy and the Streamliners will be going into the studio to record an album after a tour down south.

D.J. Smokin' Joe Roche, from WMUA, said the night will be really exciting. Junior Wells, who is performing at the Iron Horse, will drop in on Jerry's show. Roche, the MUA student blues director, said that anyone who has a feeling for the blues should go to the show. "There is no other station that plays as much blues as WMUA. People should go to the show to support the blues and WMUA. There will be a lot of hot harp from the heart," he said.

Blight is ska delight

Urban Blight

By RICHARD J. TOOMEY
Collegian Correspondent

The music of Urban Blight is fast becoming a smash success. They are influenced by bands, such as the Average White Band and Madness, but their use of a reggae sound, along with other street music, the group has developed it's own unique ska sound. Their driving horn section and the soulful singing are the main sources of power behind the band.

The band has been playing for well over ten years. Original members, namely Keene Carse and Wyatt Sprague, began experimenting with their music in 1971, when they were just 11 years old. Since then, their music has been igniting audiences in concerts across New York. The seven-member band intend to release their fifth album, but their desire is to remain a musical force in the New York club scene.

Their latest hit, "From the Westside to the Eastside," is now the number one selling consignment product in the history of Tower Records. It has received praise in both foreign and domestic music circles. The loyal and enthusiastic nature of their fans is the major motivating influence for their music as well as their upcoming album.

The unique style of Tony Orbach (tenor sax) and Paul Uercesi (alto sax) have made them trademark members of the group, and their stage presence has captured the enthusiasm of many "Blighters." They have recorded with Bob Dylan, the Beastie Boys and the Fleshtones.

Their stage performance is exceptional, ranging from Keene Carse's artwork for the band to Wyatt Sprague's flawless bass playing. If one looks at the numerous clubs where they have performed, there is tremendous popular support for the Urban Blight music among both fans and other musicians.

While still headlining numerous New York clubs, they have begun to tour the east coast. They have headlined at the Ritz in New York City 15 times, as well as at the Palladium, the Cat Club and numerous other clubs.

Hunter-Ronson Band: All the way to Hadley

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

All the young dudes have carried the news all across the Valley and all the way to Memphis. Ian Hunter, former leader of the legendary band Mott the Hoople, has once again teamed up with Mick Ronson, for what promises to be a monster reunion. The tour stops at Katina's on Saturday night.

Aside from his work in Mott the Hoople, the innovative group with the flamboyant stage act and hit singles such as "Sucker," "All the Way to Memphis" and the youth anthem "All the Young Dudes," Hunter has had a successful solo career, penning such single as "All of the Good Ones Are Taken" and "Central Park 'n' West." Everyone from Jaco Pastorious to Mick Jones (Clash and Big Audio Dynamite) and members of Queen and Bruce Springsteen's E Street Band have appeared on his albums. His songs have been covered by everyone from Barry Manilow ("Ships") to Great White ("Once Bitten, Twice Shy").

Mick Ronson was a prominent member of David Bowie's Spiders From Mars band, and toured with Van Morrison and Bob Dylan before meeting up with Hunter. They first worked together on Mott the Hoople's last single, "Saturday Gigs." Along with appearing on Hunter's solo albums, Ronson has also done production work for people such as Lisa Dalbello.

The duo's new album on Mercury/Phonogram, and their subsequent tour mark the first time they've worked together since 1983.

Steve Jones, former Sex Pistol who scored a hit with "Mercy," the title track from his lazy pop album, opens the Katina's show. On stage the long haired one expends much more energy than he did on his mediocre album. You have to learn something while touring with Johnny Rotten and Sid Vicious.

Unions join hands in support of strike

First time since 1975 that labor, students united

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Two-thousand University faculty, staff and students jammed into the Student Union yesterday as a new chant of "Workers, students will never be defeated!" was introduced by David Mitchell, Local 1776 union representative.

Inclement weather forced the rally, scheduled to take place on the Student Union steps, to be moved inside the building.

In a historic meeting of unions and students, representatives of five unions — the union for clerical and technical employees, the union for trades, maintenance and service employees, the union for teaching and research assistants, the faculty union and the professional employees union — expressed appreciation and support for the Undergraduate Union strike.

"This is a historic day for UMass: all five unions and students are united in a common cause — to fight the budget cuts," Mitchell said.

Director of Labor Relations at UMass Harvey L. Freidman said it is an unprecedented event for all five labor organizations to join together. He said that this is the first time since 1975 that a labor organization and students have united on an issue.

Diane Jacoby, representing professional staff on campus, read a letter from UMass Trustee and Secretary-Treasurer of AFL/CIO, Robert Haynes. He stated his support for the demands made by the unions.

The demands include no layoffs, no reductions in benefits for employees and for the University to recognize and negotiate with the Graduate Employee Organization (District 65 of the United Auto Workers). The unions are also in full support of the demands voiced by students for no further budget cuts to higher education, a progressive tax package of increased taxes, and no fee or tuition increases.

University Staff Associates representative Ed Patterson said, "We can make a lot of noise here but what counts is if they hear us in the legislature."

John Cole, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors said it was important to register to vote.

"But it would be better to call representatives and tell them you'll work on the campaigns in the Fall that support Higher Education," Cole said. "Or better yet, you can run for political office in your own district."

Renee Heberle, representing District 65 UAW said, "We are fast on the road to bringing GEO into a labor organization. We will gain our deserved recognition."

"We should receive wages for our work. We work just like the rest of the people in this room," she said. "The attitude towards [graduate] students must change."

Heberle then invited everyone in the SUB to sing a song composed by members of the GEO, which celebrated their solidarity.

Joining hands above their heads, the crowd sung the chorus of, "Solidarity forever, our union makes us strong," to "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah".

Joanne Levenson, as a representative from Local 509 spoke for the professional employees across campus.

"This campus is declining right under our eyes. The child-care system at this University is being totally dismantled by the administration," she said. "We urge everyone to protest these cuts."

Cole said he was impressed by the week's events.

"I was talking to some employees earlier in this semester and they said nowhere in higher education was there any political will.

Renee Heberle

"By the events of the past week, you have shown a tremendous demonstration of political will and energy," Cole said. "We have been impressed by the organizing skill, they [legislature] are beginning to hear you."

Cole told the ralliers that the top people in education are fleeing the University and faculty are beginning to follow their "responsible" lead. He said the faculty came to the University from all over the country, and it is important for students to let their professors know they are valued.

"Go home over Thanksgiving break and contact everyone you know, have them contact their legislators. It will not be over this legislative session," Cole said.

Representatives from the Union of Undergraduates thanked labor unions for their support and ideas.

Escort Service restored after gaining financial aid

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Staff

The Escort Service is scheduled for full restoration today.

Restoration of the service, originally canceled in September because of budget cuts, was made possible through several donations and grants: a $1,000 grant from the Student Government Association, a $1,000 donation from Anne Wexler, wife of Chancellor Duffey, and a grant from New England Telephone, said William Weitzer, assistant vice chancellor for student affairs.

Weitzer added that the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs plans to pay the balance if current funding is not enough to get the service continued through year's end.

The office expects the balance to be about $9,000, he said.

Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety, said, "This version of the Escort Service will be a lot better than any we had in the past," said Hilson.

Escorts will be students and other members of the Division of Public Safety, Hilson said. Students will go through the orientation training session after they are hired, he said.

Hilson said he is working on improving the service by providing a shuttle

20 Amherst College students brave weather, support strike

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

More than 20 Amherst College students yesterday braved the wind and rain to march from Converse Hall at Amherst College to the Student Union Ballroom at the University of Massachusetts to show their support for the strike.

"I think the strike is a good idea," said Amherst College student and march organizer Doug Battema. "I don't think there's much else that can be done to reach legislators."

Amherst College president Peter Pouncey said, "I fully understand the reasons for the profound concern of UMass students."

"I find it inconscionable that [funds] should be arbitrarily mutilated in the course of the year," he said.

Chanting "Hey ho, Hey ho, the budget cuts have got to go," and "Amherst College supports the strike," and carrying signs which read "Amherst Lobbies for UMass," and "Amherst Cares — Higher Education for All," the students entered the ballroom

Students: strike ends Monday

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

About 300 University of Massachusetts undergraduates voted overwhelming last night to end the student boycott of classes Monday, and celebrate the success of the five-day student strike at a Student Union rally today at noon.

Angus McQuilken, a strike organizer and commuter area senator, said the strike has caused many students to take political action for the first time in their lives.

"Look around you, this campus is mobilized," he said. "We've made an impact."

He said students are now unified and have a stronger political voice. The strike proved to the Legislature that students on this campus can organize effectively, he said.

"Yeah, we ended the strike. But we made the strike work and if we have to, we can make it work again," he said.

John Cole, the president of the Massachusetts Society of professors, admired the sophistication of the strike and said students got valuable as political activists.

"Students can now turn energy entirely toward the political process," Cole said. "A lot of future political leaders of the Commonwealth were created this week."

He said faculty support for the boycotting students would have declined drastically if the strike continued into next week. Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for Student Affairs, said the student strike publicized the budget crisis at the University.

"It showed students really cared about this institution," he said."

Jon Courtney, a junior out-of-state student, said he does not want the strike to stop because the proposed $3,000 out-of-state tuition increase has not been rescinded by the Legislature.

"If the strike ends I'll be $3,000 poorer," he said.

Pat Cassidy, a freshman, said he is in favor of ending the strike today and then organizing another Statehouse rally with

UMass student charged with rape

A University of Massachusetts student was charged with rape after being arrested near the campus pond yesterday afternoon, police said.

Police pursued Matthew P. LeBlanc, 22, of Fairhaven, after responding to a call from the victim. She spotted LeBlanc walking south on the pathway between the campus pond and Tower Library. Police responded to the call and arrested LeBlanc at the scene, police said.

The victim, who was allegedly raped Tuesday between 2 p.m. and 4 p.m., filed a complaint that night with UMass police, who said they contacted the Northampton District Court. A warrant was then issued for LeBlanc's arrest, police said.

Police contacted LeBlanc's family members and believed he would turn himself in, police said.

Theorist to give discussion of White supremacy

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Staff

The Distinguished Visitor's Program will present Frances Cress Welsing tomorrow at 2 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The lecture, part of the DVP's Afrocentric Lecture Series, is free and open to the public.

Dr. Welsing will lecture on her "Cress Theory of Color Confrontation and White Supremacy," a theory many sociologists see as a fundamental contribution to establishing the neurochemical significance of melanin, the biological pigment found in people of color.

The theory discusses how skin albinism, the lack or deficiency of melanin, is connected with the White supremacist mentality.

"Because [Whites] are genetic recessive to all people of color, they feel themselves to be inferior to people of color and vulnerable to genetic annihilation by people genetically dominant to themselves," Welsing wrote in Ebony magazine. "This fear of genetic annihilation causes the desire to control the destroy people of color."

The theory includes an examination of the social, economic, and political implications of White supremacist thought, and stresses the importance that people recognize White supremacy as a mental illness with serious implications.

"We should firmly understand that, as a mental [illness], it [White supremacy] becomes most active in the presence of economic, labor, and government instability — when the appearance of White superiority is threatened — and that it can again cause death and destruction on the same scale that it did in Nazi Germany and is currently doing in South Africa," Welsing wrote.

Welsing's theory, in addition to being considered an in-depth analysis of racism, includes a statement that advises people how to respond to the prevalence of racism.

"Let us as Black people as a whole work to counter the racist thrust to turn all people of color into functional inferiors," she wrote. "Let us be about the truly intelligent business of building a higher humanity that is truly concerned with the maximal development of all the people on this planet Earth."

A graduate of Howard University Medical School, and a medical officer in the Department of Human Resources in Washington, Welsing has written extensively on the mental health of Black people. Some of her other published works include Speaking Out: on Black Genetic Inferiority, The Symbolism of Christ, the Cross, the Crucifixion and the Communion in the White Supremacy System and Culture, and Melanin: The Neurochemical Basis for Soul.

Grad students lobby House

By JOHN PATRICK MUSULIN
Collegian Staff

More than 30 University of Massachusetts graduate students drove to Boston yesterday to continue lobbying legislators to support public higher education.

The lobbying efforts were organized by the Graduate Student Senate and the Graduate Employees Organization. Organizers asked students to speak to state representatives and their aides about budget cuts and how they affect UMass.

"We have to communicate to them that we will vote for the people who have supported higher education," said Rob Anderson, a graduate student senator.

"The next step will be a community outreach program that will cover all of the voting districts and make public the representatives' voting records," he said.

Lobbyists delivered information packets to the representatives that included a letter from the GSS.

"Contrary to public belief, the forced budget cuts have not simply trimmed fat from a state system bloated by an excess of top administrators," the letter stated.

"[The cuts] have resulted in and will continue to result in real decreases in the quality and accessibility of public higher education in Massachusetts," it continued.

Chris Ehmett, an undergraduate, said, "We went to the Brookline rep and spoke with his aides. They said to keep up the lobbying because that's what's effective."

The Statehouse buzzed with activity as legislators claimed they were working to solve the budget crisis.

"We're backed up against the wall," said Kevin Honan (D-Brighton). "Students and their families have to show their support for an increase in taxes to support higher education."

MassPIRG coordinator: don't put garbage to waste

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

For many, the word garbage may bring to mind images of foul-smelling heaps of discarded waste that the average person may wish to ignore.

However, Angus McQuilken, recycling project coordinator for the University of Massachusetts' chapter of MassPIRG, said this attitude towards garbage should change as recycling becomes a bigger national priority.

"In World War II, we were recycling everything because we had to," he said. "We need to remember that and discard the belief that the natural resources are unlimited."

According to a recent survey done by the recycling project, UMass students need to be more educated on issues surrounding waste and recycling.

Amy Lesser, member of the project, tabulated the results of this survey. She said of the 164 students who participated, 68 percent knew that in less than five years, 85 percent of the landfills in Massachusetts will be filled. However, only 40 percent of these same students realized that 100 percent of the landfills will eventually leak and pollute areas surrounding the waste site, she said.

McQuilken said landfills are "inherently bad" because benign and toxic materials are mixed together, producing lechtate, a compound which is a toxic pollutant. He said recycling is a much safer and productive means of dealing with waste.

"In this society, people don't like to deal with garbage — they'd rather throw it away," McQuilken said. "We need to let students know why we have to recycle."

In Massachusetts, only seven percent of the waste is recycled, said McQuilken. His project concentrates on a legislative bill that is a recycling initiative question. The bill aims to regulate the type of packaging used, which will allow the materials to be reused five times.

"The environmental protection agency has made a commitment to this," McQuilken said. "This is a consumer issue and recycling is the primary means to combat solid waste."

McQuilken has several suggestions for students interested in helping the recycling effort: participate in the newspaper drive in the UMass recyclable halls; at the supermarket ask for paper bags instead of plastic; buy glass jars instead of plastic, because glass is recyclable while the plastic used in jars is toxic when incinerated.

Information sessions are being set up in the residence halls to help students become more aware about the issues surrounding waste disposal.

McQuilken said, "People who do know about conservation have to teach those who don't if we want to make a difference."

Fight goes nationwide

Out-of-staters petition budget cuts, tuition hikes

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Many out-of-state students say they feel powerless in fighting for their University of Massachusetts education because they are not registered to vote in Massachusetts.

Leigh Ann Knope, a junior from Michigan, said she and several other students decided to form a coalition for out-of-state students Wednesday morning.

"There is a consensus among many out-of-state students that they may have to transfer if tuition is raised," Knope said. "I came to this school for a reason. I love this school and I want to fight to come back."

The group has collected about 500 signatures since yesterday afternoon. They plan to send their petition to state legislators. The petition formally rejects a proposed $1,500 per semester increase in out-of-state tuition costs.

The group has about 100 volunteers calling students from a computer listing of out-of-state and international students from their homes and dormitory rooms urging them to sign the petition and to call and write to state legislators, Knope said.

Aaron Pearlman, a sophomore from Oregon, said, "I may not come back [to UMass] next fall because of increases. It's not necessarily that I can't afford it, but I refuse to pay more money for less education."

Pearlman said the group is encouraging out-of-state students to register to vote in Amherst so they will have representatives in Boston.

Massachusetts residents are also contacting legislators. A table set up by the Student Government Association yesterday in the Student Union Ballroom provided the names of representatives and mailing supplies for some 300 students to send letters to their representatives.

John Aldrich, who worked the table yesterday, said many representatives fear the loss of voters if they vote for increased taxes.

"I'm telling students to say that we are all for education and if you support a progressive tax bill, I will support you [for re-election]," he said.

Tables for both activities will be in the Student Union Ballroom again tomorrow.

Prof.: Education needed to fight U.S. drug problem

By JAMES ELLIOTT
Collegian Correspondent

A Harvard professor said Wednesday night that the United States should concentrate on educating its citizens about drugs rather than eliminating the source of the drugs.

Gregory Treverton, who is also a member of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, discussed "Drugs and Political Instability in Latin America: The U.S. Response."

"I quote lots of people, but not after Nancy Reagan. But she seems to have gotten this issue about right. She said, 'It is the United States alone which is responsible for its drug problem.' That's probably the theme of what I want to say," he said.

Treverton said the drug problem, with its crime and corruption, may endanger democracy in some Latin American countries. He said aid to these countries should be directed more towards economic problems then military and enforcement efforts.

Treverton covered the advantages and drawbacks of the different stages and methods of drug enforcement. He said the war on drugs must be fought primarily here in the United States with the users themselves through education and that other methods, such as drug seizures of interdiction, defoliation or eradication and arresting the traffickers, are ineffective.

While the drug problem can never be completely eliminated, it could be controlled through adequate education and understanding of the dangers involved with drug use, he said.

"This drug issue seems . . . one to me, where there is plenty of heat, and maybe not quite enough light," Treverton said. "If I can supply a little of that or a least be the springboard for an interesting conversation I'll feel that it's been worthwhile."

Treverton received his doctorate from Harvard University, was a staff member on the first Select Senate Committee on Intelligence, a committee set up after the Watergate Scandals to investigate the government covert operations, and was on Carter's National Security Council staff dealing with Europe.

He is the author of several books including The Dollar Drain, American Forces in Germany, Making the Alliance Work, The United States and Western Europe, and Covert Action: The Limits of Intervention in the Postwar World.

other state colleges.

"Although, next time we should go on a march through the streets of Boston," he said.

David Golovner, a strike organizer, said the strike successfully brought together faculty, staff and students with common goals. Members of the University community must register to vote, he said, and then convince legislators and other voters that cuts to the higher education budget cannot be tolerated.

Michael Fontaine, a sophomore, said he wanted the strike to end before he fell too far behind in class.

"If some of us stay out any longer we're going to flunk out then we won't have to worry about any tuition hikes," he said.

McQuilken said the Union of Undergraduates intends to become a statewide organization that works for students' political interests. The union leaders want to have strong support at all 28 state colleges in time to influence the November 1990 state elections.

"The majority of people who work on political campaigns are students," he said. "We want to make damn sure that a legislator who voted against us is not going to be back in office."

Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) briefed some of the students about the most effective tactics for lobbying efforts.

"Getting parents to communicate their support for increased revenues is very important," said Sandy Rhoades, a mathematics teaching assistant.

There was a consensus among legislators and student lobbyists that today's efforts should only be the beginning of an ongoing show of opposition to cuts to state programs.

"I think this was successful in the context of being part of a sustained lobbying effort," said Tony Vecchione, an education graduate student.

During yesterday's session, Rosenberg proposed a general amendment, calling for a "Declaration of Higher Education Emergency." The amendment, which passed unanimously, stated that the General Court "stands committed to developing long term solutions" and "restoring necessary funding to the public system of higher education."

He said he received several calls and petitions from students regarding the cancellation of the service but he said they had no bearing on the restoration of the Escort Service.

The Escort Service was started in 1983 by a group of students. In 1986 the service became more active by combining foot patrols with mobile escorts.

Mobile escorts are available from 5 p.m. to 3 a.m. seven days a week.

to the cheering and clapping of more than 100 UMass students.

"[The Amherst students] rejuvenate us," said Liz Hart, vice president of the UMass Board of Governors. "This shows that this isn't just a public education issue."

Amherst College student Steve Mansini, president of Students for Educational Equality, said SEE has been lobbying legislators for more than a year for legislation to increase educational opportunity.

He said he feels the march to UMass "fits in with our commitment to bring about equal education."

He added that Amherst College also hopes to spread some goodwill between themselves and UMass.

"We're hoping that this [march] will persuade people not to come over in the snowball fight this year," he said, referring to last year's snowball fight between UMass and Amherst College, in which Amherst College sophomore Gary Gonya lost partial vision after he was hit with a snowball.

He added, "More Christmas carols are fine."

Battema, who is the secretary for SEE, said he wanted to show support for UMass students because he would react the same way if he were at UMass.

"I think all college students should strike together," he said. "Public education should not be limited to those who can afford it."

Amherst College sophomore Andrew Seldon said, "I take a class at UMass — I have a concrete reason for valuing public education.

We all deserve to be thankful

Nineteen hundred members of the United Mine Workers of America (UMW) have been on strike against the Pittston Coal Company since April 5.

They are involved in a bitter struggle for their jobs, their families, and their lives.

Even though we are not coal miners, their fight is important to us too.

Kim W. Jones

Last year, Pittston was the only major coal company to refuse to sign the industry-wide contract negotiated with the UMW. After working for 14 months without a contract, Pittston workers went out on strike.

The company refused to extend their old contract during negotiations. They also cut off health benefits for 1500 retired and disabled miners — those who need it most.

Pittston is demanding give-backs in job security, and cuts in health and pension benefits. They are also trying to force miners to work mandatory Sunday overtime. Since the strike began, thousands of miners and their families have been arrested in civil disobedience demonstrations.

Pittston has the backing of the governor and state police.

Arrested miners have been locked in buses for seven hours at a time without being allowed to go to the bathroom. In 90 degree weather, police forced them to keep the windows closed and turned on the heat in the bus.

The National Labor Relations Board has charged Pittston with 25 counts of lawbreaking.

The Pittston miners are engaged in a battle for their economic survival. But the outcome of that fight will effect us as well.

What kind of country will we have to look forward to working in if Pittston is allowed to win this strike?

What kind of job security will we ever have if a company is allowed to unilaterally break agreements and break the law?

The Pittston miners are fighting for the future of every young person who will ever be a part of the American work force.

The women and men of the Virginia coal fields are waging a battle that has inspired thousands with its courage and determination.

They have been joined in that struggle by other unions, religious communities, students and others.

They have asked people to come to Virginia, to their "Camp Solidarity," to help them.

We are answering their call, and will be going to Camp Solidarity during Thanksgiving.

Anyone interested in going with us are asked to contact Rick at 256-8758. Those who cannot go but want to support the United Mine Workers, come to a talk by two of the miners on Nov. 29, at Draper Hall, room 122.

We are going to make sure that all of us — not just corporate executives and wealthy politicians — can live in a society for which we can be thankful.

Kim W. Jones is member of the UMass chapter of Democratic Socialists of America

A pressing issue for everyone

"Rape is a woman's problem." Crap.

"Women never ask to be raped." Good: more words.

Listen guys (meaning females and males) — rape is a problem relating to all of us.

The immediate victim is a woman, but you rape a friend of mine and I suffer with her.

Furthermore, you hurt a friend, don't expect me to like you. On a larger scale, you hurt a person, stop her from contributing what she, and society as a whole suffers.

Talking about it is fine and good, but it's not enough. It's high time we started doing something about it — women and men.

There are two steps we can all take: prevention and intervention. The first starts with women being able to defend themselves.

Being a foreigner, I'm not sure what's legal and what isn't in the market of gas canisters but there are other alternatives to spending the next ten years getting a black belt.

It goes on to acting sensibly: if you are asking for a lift, alone, at 3 a.m. in the morning wearing a "short lace skirt and no underwear" and get raped, your rapist should still be hanged, without mitigating circumstances what so ever.

But it's a rape that could have been avoided. You see somebody asking for a lift at the cool hours of the night, even if it means driving that extra mile.

Intervention means not minding our own business. Needless to say, you see a rape going on, use force if you can or call the police immediately.

You see a friend getting into a situation that you feel is "rape-risky," don't assume everything is going to be OK. Pour a bucket of cold water on top of her head (or his!) if need be but do something.

All this isn't fair. It shouldn't happen. Our police should protect us. Men shouldn't rape. But some do and there's a limit to what any police can handle.

And so it is up to us. To all of us.

One out of five women raped is not a statistic any more. It's a nightmare.

FOREIGN POLICY
1989 THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER NORTH AMERICA SYNDICATE
GORRELL

"WELL IF YOU ASK ME, THE COLD WAR IS THAWING OUT JUST A LITTLE TOO DARNED FAST!"

Erring against the victims

What is the American public's perception of President Bush?

Is he a wimp, some sort of indecisive character who is simply doing the job?

This is my image, yet despite this seemingly gentle exterior, he has made some very dangerous decisions during his term in office.

Peggie Klekotka

For one, President Bush, who was pro-ERA and pro-choice before 1980, has not exactly been a strong supporter of women's rights. In fact, his recent veto of a bill that would allow Medicaid funds to be used for abortions in cases of rape and incest, places him solidly in an anti-woman, anti-equality, and anti-choice camp.

This veto also puts him significantly outside of contemporary mainstream thought. The fact is that the majority of the American public supports a woman's right to choose. Even of those who do not support choice in all circummstances, 80 percent, support the right to abortion for women who have become pregnant as a result of rape or incest.

In vetoing the bill, Bush declared that he wanted to, "... err on the side of human life." With this statement, he makes the dangerous mistake of conveniently forgetting over 50 percent of the population.

For example, he forgot about the life of a 12 year-old girl who was a victim of incest. Not only was she sexually molested and raped by her father, and then forced to be silent about her experience, but she also became pregnant because of this abuse.

As a result of Bush's decision, she must carry that fetus for nine months. She's only in seventh grade. She hasn't even been kissed by someone her own age. Yet she has to carry a fetus to term. What about the destruction of her life?

Bush also forgot about the life of a young woman who is working her way through college with federal help. One night, she became a victim of date rape, a violation which is occurring with frightening frequency on college campuses across the country. She thinks it was her fault, maybe she led him on somehow, aren't women supposed to be safe with men that they know?

She had no desire to have sex with him, how could a friend do that to her? By the time that she has begun to deal with the pain and the guilt of the rape, she realizes that she has missed her period for two months.

Yet, because Bush, ". . . erred on the side of human life," she has continual, searing, and painful memories of that night — with every kick or movement of the fetus, she remembers. What about her life?

Bush also forgot about the woman who is a victim of battering. She can't leave the situation because it is impossible to support herself and her children on her own.

She has four kids, and even with her husband's income and federal help, they are having a hard time making ends meet.

But sometimes, her husband hits her. Sometimes he hits her really hard, so hard that she has bruises, in fact they never seem to go away.

And, sometimes, he makes her have sex when she doesn't want to. She feels violated and unclean, but he's her husband, so it's not really rape, is it?

One day, she discovers that she's pregnant. How can they possibly afford to feed and care for another child?

But, she can't have an abortion because a White man in a white house said that he would rather, ". . . err on the side of human side."

In their pain, these women scream — WHOSE LIFE?"

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Perestroika for Latin America needed

We heard how students struggled in China to achieve democracy. We have been reading and listening as to how the Berlin Wall has come down, allowing the East Germans to have a taste of democracy. We cried when we saw the student movement crushed in China.

The Communist East is changing so rapidly that we might not be able to cope with the excitement. But, in contrast to what is happening in the Eastern Bloc — here in this hemisphere US/Latin American relations seem to be frozen in confrontation.

Nancy Rios

We are once again attacking the Sandinistas without listening to their requests. President Bush went to Costa Rica and openly insulted the Nicaraguan President, Daniel Ortega, by calling him "a little man."

Are we changing too, or are we keeping the same old song, what we want the Latin American countries to do is to achieve DEMOCRACY? What are we doing to help them to do so? If our common enemy is now our common friend (Soviet Union), then why don't we work-out our differences with tiny Nicaragua? The Sandinistas have never called themselves communist. If we disregard the notion that they are communists, then we are left with people who want social change and peace.

El Salvador provides another example of a U.S. policy frozen in past patterns. El Salvador is the smallest country in Latin America, located between Guatemala and Honduras. This country receives 1.5 million dollars daily in military aid from the U.S. government. Approximately, 90 percent of El Salvador's population lives in poverty. In the last 10 years, at least 70,000 Salvadorans have lost their lives in civil war supported by the United States.

The University of El Salvador (UES) has become a symbol of a struggle for the Salvadorans. It is the only public institution for higher education in El Salvador. The UES was forcibly closed by the government from 1980-1984. Since Dec. 22, 1988 a chain of soldiers has surrounded the campus. The only thing that has kept the doors of the University open has been international support.

Two weeks ago, the students were holding a peaceful demonstration on the campus when someone threw a grenade into the crowd injuring many of the participants. Today, El Salvador is in a state of siege after a major attack by the rebel forces. The UES was invaded by military forces last Sunday. The medical school has been destroyed and machine guns have been used against students. A curfew is in effect in San Salvador from 6 p.m. - 6 a.m.

One has to ask if our tax money should be used to support this kind of democracy?

Now, where do we go from here? Maybe we need our own Perestroika in which we will allow our neighbors in Central America to go their own way without us interfering in their affairs.

Based on what had happened in Poland, Hungary, East Germany, and in El Salvador over the past few months, one can conclude that neither Soviet communist nor the U.S. style "democracy" can be exported to neighboring states.

The Soviet Union, so far, seems to be accepting change in its sphere of influence. Would the United States be able to cope with the changes that Nicaraguans, Salvadorans and others of its neighbors are asking for?

When President Bush talks about democracy in Latin America I become confused. We have learned from watching Eastern Europe that democracy can be best achieved through talks, not through supporting governments that are not serving the interests of the majority of their people. Perhaps, we should follow the Soviets' lead and permit neighboring states to define democracy for themselves.

"ICH BIN EIN BERLINER!"

Focus on domestic issues

The opening of the Berlin Wall, one of the largest in a series of historic changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, provides an important opportunity for the Bush administration to re-examine the U.S. role in the world. The disappearance of the Soviet role as an imperialistic state wishing to establish a communist monolith, is rendering bankrupt, the Cold War mentality which has set the agenda in American foreign policy for almost 45 years.

Jason George

Just as Mikhail Gorbachev is replacing the maintenance of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe with treatment of the ailing Soviet economy, the United States must replace containment of communism with improving American competitiveness in the burgeoning international economy.

McGeorge Bundy, a former national security adviser to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson (formerly an ardent cold warrior) said recently that although the end of the Cold War is upon us, "We should not look at the end to history."

Indeed, the United States should look at the end of the Cold War as an opportunity to move ahead and address new challenges which lie at our feet.

In order to remove the costly vestiges of the Cold War, the United States should leave the NATO alliance. Though the fate of the Warsaw Pact is currently uncertain, the tenuous fate of communism demonstrates that it will never be the threat it was once perceived as.

Bundy stated that "the real purpose of NATO is political security, not military security." As the communist "monolith" which has been seen as such an onerous threat is chipped away, there is no need for he United States to continue pouring $170 billion per year into NATO.

There are many in Washington who want badly to preserve NATO and continue to spend exorbitant amounts of money on the most advanced weapons. Just ask Colorado Congresswoman Patricia Schroeder, who feels $170 billion/year of American money would be better spent on child care, public education, and health care.

"In Washington, family policy is not a power issue . . .you mention 'families' and people in Washington think you've got lace on your shorts," Schroeder said. "They're into power projection — the MX, the D-5, the Midgetman. That's what's considered serious in Washington."

The Bush adminstration should turn its attention to helping improve America's competitiveness in the world. The way to do this is to start with quality education for America's youth, who are tomorrow's leader. With the Soviet Union turning rapidly inward, Bush has no excuse for not moving his focus toward domestic improvements. In particular, the president must begin to deliver on his promise of serving as the "education president."

Although Bush entered office in a time of American contentment and apparent prosperity, it will be difficult for him to maintain his mandate unless he renders containment and interventionism as things of the past.

In 1992, Bush will face re-election with a unified Europe and a host of other challenges. A declining America is a definite possibility unless changes are made.

As Jack Beatty wrote in the Atlantic Monthly, it is time ". . .that George Bush's America can emulate Mikhail Gorbachev's Russia and let its foreign policy serve its domestic necessities."

Appreciating manly brain power

I'm writing in response to Darren Garnick's editorial, "The Pro-cynic perspective," (Nov. 15).

He stated that he "shared" the fear that "women's bodies will become government property."

I would just like to say we little girls of feeble brains appreciate the support of a big, smart man like Garnick.

He dismissed the issue that men don't have a right to an opinion about abortion as a "silly argument."

Who would be forced to carry the fetus for nine months?

The woman.

Who would be forced to change her entire life for the unwanted child?

The woman.

Who would bear the brunt of suffering for such archaic laws?

The innocent child.

Despite the fact that Garnick's opinion as a man is worth twice as much as mine, as a woman, I maintain that men don't have a justifiable voice on abortion.

But that doesn't matter, since men will continue to feel they must control and oppress women.

I'd like to inform Garnick that if women were running this country instead of men, there would never be any threat to women's lives like that which exists now, before the male-dominated Supreme Court and male president.

As for his expression of disgust concerning the commercialism of the recent rally in Washington D.C., I am surprised. It fits in perfectly with his notions that a woman should be seen and not heard.

Perhaps he just doesn't want to be reminded that women can have opinions.

Again, we silly females express our eternal gratitude to Garnick for his manly brains supporting our lives.

I have to go now — I haven't finished ironing my boyfriend's clothes.

Victims need each other

The incident that concerned the 22 year-old woman in Fort Lauderdale, her rape and her attacker's subsequent sentencing, is closer to our quaint little community than you might imagine.

On Oct. 19, 1989, I was myself raped. And as much as it will pain those of my friends that know of what happened, I will lend my thoughts to the rest of the community.

The jury convicting the rapist in Florida felt that because the woman didn't react in the manner that they expected, so they believed she deserved it.

Chris Bielak

The pain, self-loathing, disgust, shame — that a woman feels after a rape is a burden that no human being should have to bear. I know — I'm living with it right now.

While I know that the attack wasn't my fault, I didn't "ask for it." Unlike others sharing my pain, I can talk easily about what happened to me. The pain of silence is worse than the pain of retelling. Instead of having my friends wonder why I'm acting so sullen, I told them very calmly, very matter-of-factly that I had been raped. The response that I received absolutely floored me.

Just like the woman in Fort Lauderdale, I too reacted "improperly." Because I could talk about my rape without hysteria or tears, and found the strength to face days with laughter instead of tears, to find goodness in the world after the violation of my body and my soul, I was scorned.

People didn't believe the fact that I had been raped. There are those who actually had the nerve to suggest that the rape had never occurred at all. Instead of having the people that I cared about see that I had the strength to survive and retain the belief that people are basically good, I found no end of grief.

Seems that by not following the patterns that they felt I should, I lost my credibility and their compassion.

What did this experience cost me? It cost me the friendship of a few people that I cared about. It cost me a relationship with a man I was beginning to fall in love with. It caused me anger that I never should have felt. My anger should have been towards my attacker, not with the world around me. It cost me a bit of my self-respect, for I began to believe everyone else for a minute.

My message to the victims, their loved ones, the community as a whole, and to my friends both with me and lost is this: don't judge the victim of a sexual assault by what you feel is proper.

Everyone deals with it in their own special way that is proper for them, not for you. They need you to care, not to judge. Walk with them, don't add to their burden. Love them and help them to heal.

To the friends that I've lost: I'm sorry if you can't understand what I'm going through, but if this causes you to leave my life then Ciao Sweets, who needs you. I was wrong about you I guess.

To the man that I lost: look at me, not at what happened to me. I am still the woman that I was before the incident. I am stronger now and I've learned a lot more about myself. My heart is still as good and pure as it ever was.

I've begun to let it go why won't you? I'm not avoiding my problems, I accept them and know which way to go from here.I miss you so much.

Finally, to the women of UMass: If there is anyone out there who has been a victim and wants the empathy of another woman — seek me out.

I'm not ashamed to have my name in print, don't be ashamed to seek me out.

Walk a while with me and let's share the pain. Let's learn from each other.

This is something not meant to be dealt with alone. We all need each other too much in this life.

Group asks to boycott Murphy Film

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

A New York based group has asked people to boycott Eddie Murphy's latest film on the basis that it exploits Harlem.

Posters distributed by the New York based Committee Against the Exploitation of Harlem, and hung in Thatcher dormitory have asked people to boycott Murphy's latest Paramount film, Harlem Nights.

The poster, which calls Murphy "Uncle Tom of the Year," and refers to him as "Paramount's House Negro," asks people to boycott because Murphy chose to film in Hollywood instead of Harlem, where the story takes place, thus denying the Harlem community a chance to gain revenue.

The poster reads, "Eddie Murphy wants Harlem without Harlem. Malcolm X taught us that the Black community must keep it's 'Economic recycling' in the African-American community. Eddie Murphy says, 'Help him stay in the house,' while you starve in the fields."

The poster lists four demands:

(A) We want Eddie Murphy and Paramount to film in Harlem.

(B) We want Eddie Murphy and Paramount Pictures to support the African-American Black Arts Movement.

(C) We want Paramount to support the development of African-American filmmakers.

(D) We want Eddie Murphy to come to New York and show solidarity with the African-American community that he has snubbed.

The Committee Against the Exploitation of Harlem held a protest on Monday, Nov. 6 (Black Solidarity Day) in front of the Paramount Communications Gulf and Western Building in New York.

A spokesperson for Paramount pictures, who refused to give his name, said that he was not aware of the committee or the protest, although he had heard of some picketing. He said that it would not be feasible to shoot in Harlem because, "The movie takes place in 1938, and that's hardly the same locale as the Harlem of today."

He said that Paramount has supported the African-American community. "We have Eddie Murphy and have done other movies with Black people," he said. He did not answer when asked what these movies were.

In a press release, Redd Foxx, who lived in Harlem from 1939 to 1951, and stars in the movie with Murphy and Richard Pryor, said the Hollywood set reminded him of the area he grew up in. "The same attitude, the same atmosphere, what people are wearing and the hairdos — it was the same in Harlem back then," he said.

Eddie Murphy's agent, Terry Williams, said, "We've been aware of the group [Committee Against Exploitation of Harlem] for awhile now. We've told them that the decision [to shoot the film in Hollywood] was done purely for economic reasons, but they continue to protest."

Williams noted that actors from Harlem worked in the film, as well as in Murphy's previous film, Coming to America. "The Harlem actors and actresses were just in Los Angeles," she said.

Williams also mentioned that two sneak previews were held at the Paramount studios in New York for the people of Harlem, and that this week alone, Murphy has participated in three events for the Afro-American community. All of the proceeds from last night's opening in Los Angeles are going to the United Negro College Fund.

What happens when contemporary folk does the two step is doing an Aztec two-step. . .

So goes the lines of the Lawrence Ferlinghetti poem from which musical pair Aztec Two-Step acquires their name, as well as the title of their latest release, See it was like this. . .

Subtitled an acoustic retrospective, and their first album for Flying Fish records, See it was like this. . . combines the reflective honesty of hits past and present, making for a unique collection of contemporary folk with a conscience.

PREVIEW

Rising to the folk scene with their debut album in 1972, Aztec Two-Step members Rex Fowler and Neil Shulman continue to impress audiences with their undulations of instrumental simplicity and bittersweet harmonies.

They have been seen performing with a wide array of artists, from the likes of Bruce Springsteen, Suzanne Vega and Jackson Browne, to the talent of the Talking Heads, J. Geils Band and Heart. Named in Billboard magazine's year-end poll, their 1986 release Living in America also captured the 1987 New York Music Award for Best Folk Album.

With the accompaniment of their "twin guitar sound," this duo travels to Northampton tonight to entertain the audience in the folk tradition at the Iron Horse.

With their expressive lyrics and a vocal authenticity, Aztec Two-Step promises to be an experience in good music and relaxed humor that should take precedence in your evening plans.

GRADUATE STUDENT RESPONSE TO BUDGET CUTS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

Prepared by a General Meeting of Graduate Students on November 14, 1989

We, representing the 6,640 graduate students at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, condemn the repeated attacks on public higher education, and the more recent cuts affecting our own campus. As graduate students we are acutely aware of the disastrous effects of these cuts as they affect us both as students and employees of this university. We believe the budget cuts are now endangering the very quality and accessibility of our institution.

(1) We are therefore calling on the state legislature to not cut the public higher education budget any further; specifically to support the Rosenberg amendments that would reinstate funding to our universities and colleges, to support the O'Leary amendments that would save student employees from cutbacks in 03 line item, to support efforts to keep out-of-state tuition at its current level and fees related to university trust funds at their current level;

(2) We are furthermore extending our support to striking students by joining their class boycott for the remainder of the week;

(3) We also encourage graduate students to consider a two day work stoppage as proposed by the coordinating committee of the Graduate Employee Organization and urge faculty, staff and administrators to support the stoppage in any way possible.

(4) We urge the Legislature to raise revenues to support public Higher Education by progressive taxation and not at the expense of other social programs.

(5) We direct the graduate student representatives to the Leadership Coalition to work with other representatives to develop a campus-wide strategy to protest budget cuts coupled with promoting tax reform.

(For more information, call the Graduate Senate at 5-2896.)

San Salvador battle continues

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) - Government forces attacked rebel positions today in the fiercest combat of the 5 day old battle of San Salvador. Six priests were tortured and killed in a massacre at a Roman Catholic school.

One church leader said the brutal slayings were probably the work of rightest death squads. But a priest at the scene said uniformed soldiers were spotted entering the priests' residence before the shooting began.

The government and armed forces denied that any troops were involved.

Nearly 700 people have died in the fighting in and around San Salvador.

The resounding boom of army mortars and reports form assault rifles echoed across the capitial, with fire from the Zacamil on the northern edge almost continuous from shortly before 4 a.m. until dawn.

Red tracer bullets and orange flairs dropped by circling helicopters lighted the night sky.

Light tanks were seen heading toward the embattled district.

37 fighter bombers screamed low over the city in several runs westward, presumably toward rebel positions near the western suburb of Marlict, where fighting was heavy Wednesday night.

Deafening explosions following the swoops gave the impression the planes were dropping 250-pound or 500-pound bombs on insurgents concentrated on the lower slopes of the San Salvador volcano.

The six Jesuit priests were slain at about 3 a.m., their faces disfigured and their brains removed from their skulls at the home they shared on adjoining grounds of Jose Simeon Canas Central American University, one of the regions most prestigious institutions of higher learning.

The victims were tortured, then shot to death, officials said. "If this spiral of violence continues, death and destruction will sweep away many, especially those who are of most use to our people," San Salvador's Archbishop Arturo Rivera Damas said after leading a prayer over the mutilated bodies.

Eduardo Valdaz, Director of Jesuit Studies, said the Jesuits had received many anonymous threats in past days and that a rightest death squad was probably responsible for the killings. The extreme right, for more than a decade accused the Jesuit order and its university of fostering subversive leftist ideology.

A Jesuit priest who spoke on condition of anonimity told the journalists at the sight of the massacre that a witness saw about 50 uniformed soldiers enter the university grounds and the priests' residence shortly before the shots rang out.

"There have been soldiers posted at the gates since Sunday. The murders were committed in the middle of a curfew. The same house where they were killed was raided and searched by soldiers on Tuesday," said the priest.

The Rev. Jose Maria Togeria, the Jesuit Provincial for Central America, identified the slain priests as Ignacio Ellacuria, the university rector; Igancio Martin Baro, the vice rector; Oegundo Montes, Amando Lopez, Juan Ramon Mareno and Joaquin Lopez Lopez. Togeria said their domestic servant and her daughter were also killed.

"They did not want to leave witnesses," said Valdez.

As of Wednesday night, more than 660 soldiers, rebels and civilians had been killed and another 1,600 wounded in the pitched fighting, according to hospital, morgue and government sources.

7 die in thunderstorm

NEWBURGH, N.Y. (AP) — A glass wall blew in on a school cafeteria during a severe thunderstorm Thursday, killing seven children and injuring 18, authorities said.

"It was a very quick thing and there wasn't anything anybody could do about it because it happened all at once," said Mayor Donald Presutti.

Rescue workers dug through the debris with a backhoe at East Coldenham Elementary School. State Trooper Robert Gillespie could not say whether more victims were believed to be in the rubble.

It was not known how many students were in the cafeteria when the storm blew in a wall of windows during lunch.

The storm system was the same one that moved through the South on Wednesday, spinning off tornadoes that killed 19 people in Alabama.

State Police and survivors said they believed the school was hit by a tornado, but the National Weather Service said it could not confirm that until investigators went to the scene.

Faye Goldstein, a district spokeswoman, put the number of dead at seven and said 18 other students were injured and taken to four hospitals. Their conditions were not immediately known.

"There are a lot of broken legs, broken ankles, arms, some head contusions, various other traumas to the body," the mayor said.

"The wall was blown down and they were in having lunch. It was right during lunch time."

"I saw a tornado come and I saw everything flying down," said one youngster, Brian Schwartz. "It looked like a tornado. All kinds of glass fell down and these little things, papers that were hanging on the windows, came down. I didn't even look back."

UMass sister school bombed heavily

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The University of El Salvador, a sister school of the University of Massachusetts, was bombed yesterday, it was announced last night.

Nancy Rios, chairperson of the University of El Salvador/University of Massachusetts committee, said UES was bombed this week by the Salvadoran military. The University was strafed and bombed during the San Salvadoran battle between the FMLN rebels and the Salvadoran government, which is heavily backed by the United States government, she said.

Doug Calvin, the national student coordinator for the Committee for People in Solidarity with El Salvador, confirmed Rios' report that UES has been destroyed.

"The government shelled the university badly and is occupying it right now," he said. "The student population is getting hit pretty hard."

He said eyewitnesses reported to CISPES that 20 UES students were beaten by government troops and then led away blindfolded.

"Some students have taken up arms and joined the insurrection," he said. "It's all out down there."

The UES/UM committee met last night to discuss the crisis in El Salvador, and planned a strategy to help the war-torn country resolve its conflict as quickly as possible.

UES/UM was instituted by the Graduate Student Senate a few years ago, said Rios, a doctoral student in education. At the same time, the senate voted to make UES — the largest university in El Salvador — UMass' sister university.

"UES/UM was formed to support UES students in their struggle for an autonomous university," Rios said, adding that the Salvadoran government closely monitors student activities.

Rios said the government troops, who are not accustomed to close combat, have resorted to bombing the city, resulting in hundreds of civilian casualties.

She said the Salvadoran government receives $1.5 million a day in U.S. military aid, and that President Bush has received a request from Salvadoran President Cristiani for emergency aid.

"UMass students must phone congress and tell them we oppose any military support, and ask the U.S. government to pressure the Salvadoran government to negotiate with the FMLN," she said.

Rios is scheduled to participate in a teach-in on the situation in El Salvador today at the Commuter Lounge.

Search continues for tornado victims

HUNTSVILLE, Ala. (AP)- Rescuers crawled through collapsed homes and shops today looking for more victims of a tornado that carved a 3-mile stretch of destruction, killing 19 people, injuring 183 and leaving 1,000 homeless.

"It's like taking six to 10 city blocks and putting them in a blender and putting it on liquefy," said rescue worker Bob Caraway. He was among those called out to help dig through rubble for survivors or the bodies of the dead.

The tornado was one of a series that touched down Wednesday in an arc spanning at least seven states from the Deep South to the Midwest. The other tornadoes caused at least 19 injuries and far flung property damage.

In Huntsville, teams with cranes and floodlights searched for the injured or dead, hampered by wind whipped ruin and temperatures that plummeted overnight from 73 degrees into the 30's.

The Caroline Know/Tabula Rasa
Sheehan's Cafe
Monday, Nov.13

Monday night at Sheehan's Cafe (but it's really a bar) on Pleasant St. in Northampton is fast becoming a local institution, for lack of a more appropriate word. Offering the best of local talent, at no cover charge, on a day associated with drudge and misery is a fine idea.

The Mess, comprised of what many feel is the Malarians better half, debuted there three Mondays ago with their loud and heavy "country approach to garage rock" (according to a member of the audience who called himself "Dicky") and received a sterling reception. The increasingly jazzy/professional sounding Free Press, got the same deserved treatment two Mondays ago when they filled in for the ever bluesy Uncle Martha. And Tabula Rasa and The Caroline Know thrilled the bar flies yet again last Monday.

The Caroline Know began the evening with music that is, in the words of Mr. Rockin' Dave, "absolute purity." True enough, but more praise should be heaped upon them yet. Some may remember lead vocalist and guitarist Steve Rand as the front man from The Loneliest Christmas Tree, the band that proved that some of the Supreme Dicks actually had a little talent and soul behind their something persona (the line stops there — this is not the Dicks, Caroline are a band unto themselves, sorry I even mentioned it.).

REVIEW

In fact that deserves more than parentheses, The Caroline Know proved that they are more of a band than half the efforts being circulated. What do they have? Talent, originality, stage presence, musical ability (a lot more rare than you may think), song writing capability, and that something else, call it an aura, a sense of purpose, something different, something that causes all of this embarassing gushing (see below) from a usually indifferent hack.

Les Labarge is known throughout the area as the best bass guitar player in the Valley. Period. But that seems more than a little limiting as a description. Remember Jack Bruce from Cream; remember, other than that, all the bands you've listened to, never really noticing the bass line, as some stoned pretty boy sort of kept something unecessary going? Labarge plays his instrument like there's no tomorrow and there wasn't a yesterday. Jamming along like he's Johnny Winter or Clapton in a good moment, the passion of his playing is only complimented by the purity of the arrangements, and the never missing a beat drumming of Jason Lonestein.

Rand as guitarist, lead vocalist, looks supremely as if he belongs right on stage; his distinctive style and ability more than matching Labarge's quality and Lonestein's thundering.

This is a three piece band in the truest sense — no showing off, no theatrics, just three people immersed in the purity of expression, albeit a mellow, moody kind of expression. This is the start of something big, at least it should be.

The following is the opining of one Tony Pallone. Pallone is, among other things, the manager of local dancing fun band faves 5th Business. However, he has absolutely no official ties to Tabula Rasa, other than that of appreciation.

It was hard to miss the word about the full length debut of Tabula Rasa, one of Northampton's newest and most exciting dance rock outfits, where hard driving beats vibrated the walls.

Drawing from influences that included the politically charged power of bands such as Living Color and U2, Tabula Rasa performed an impressive selection of nearly all originals. Their songs sparked fresh life blood into a genre of music which sometimes requires a fine tooth comb to seperate its relevant lyrics from its often over bearing and repetitive musical phrasings.

Not so with Tabula Rasa, whose appropriate name means "blank slate." Hardly fettered to banalities of the musical past, their emotionally charged "moodswing" was magnetic, as was particularly evident in appreciating the style of lead singer William Mueller who completed the band's current line-up, including Ethan Laforte on lead guitar, Pat Nied and Brian Vitalis on bass and drums respectively, and Patrick Chade (a no show for this Noho show) on rhythmn guitar, when he joined two months ago.

Mueller was a whirlwind of mesmerizing energy, his lithe yet pounding dancing and powerful voice reminiscent of an early David Bowie.

Well received by the crowd at Sheehan's and happily well rehearsed and tight, the bands set was a promising debut.

A symphony that's music to the ears and the pocketbook

By STEVE PARIS
Collegian Correspondent

Tired of the same old party scene? Looking for a different night out? If so, then the Springfield Symphony Orchestra may be just the thing for you.

Through their college student rush program, the best available seats in Symphony Hall can be purchased for only $5. As Public Relations Manager Marisa Brown said, "What else can you do for that price — go to a movie?"

This Saturday night, Maestro Raymond Harvey, whose growing national acclaim can be seen in his most recent guest conducting appearances with the Detroit Symphony, New York Philharmonic, and the Indianapolis Symphony, will be leading the orchestra in a night of neoclassical music.

The third of nine performances in the Great Performers Series, the orchestra will feature Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 "Italian," and Gounod's "Petite Symphony." There will also be a special program, Words On Music, before the concert. "It's like having a music appreciation class right before hearing the works." Information about the pieces, insights into the musical devices used, and stories about the composers will all be discussed by Harvey.

PREVIEW

Most college students have the misconception that to attend a symphony you have to dress formally and be a music connoisseur of sorts. According to Brown, "Because the performers wear tuxes, many people think that they have to dress up too." But, in fact, excepting gala events, most people dress fairly casual. "It's a very comfortable atmosphere; no one would ever be turned away for dressing in comfortable clothing."

And much of the music played has appeared in movie soundtracks, commercials, television shows — all over the place. Of course, those who attend the Words On Music session will also have some knowledge of what exactly is going on.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra plays at Symphony Hall, Court Street, in Springfield. Concerts start at 8 p.m. but students need to arrive 30 minutes earlier to take advantage of the rush tickets. These can be purchased at the box office inside the hall. The Words On Music program will be held at 7 p.m. in Mahoany Hall on the second floor.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Get out of a rut. Widen your horizons and stretch your mind. Enrolling in computer courses in January will increase your earning potential. Career advancement is likely in May. New alliances are linked to financial rewards. A social triumph in June will boost your self-confidence. Enterprises that appear to be going nowhere suddenly take off in August. Romance turns around in your favor. You and loved one decide to combine households.

CELEBRITIES BORN ON THIS DATE: cover girl Lauren Hutton, pitcher Tom Seaver, movie star Rock Hudson, director martin Scorsese, singer Gordon Lightfoot.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You could be lavoring under a false impression. Take time out to obtain up-to-date facts and figures. With a little discipline, you can accomplish a great deal. Build financial reserves.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Just when you think everything is set, unexpected developments could change your plans and outlook. A delay could be a blessing in disguise. Give a wide berth to get-rich-quick schemes.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Do not overstate your case, invest more than you can afford, or take unnecessary financial risks. The potential profits could be exaggerated. Share your home life with close friends tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Surprising turnabouts favor you financially. A release of creative energy marks the start of a successful venture. Imaginative work will go well. Hang in there!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): An argument or heated debate could clear the air and ultimately restore harmony. Go over the family budget calmly with mate and other loved ones. Everyone needs to make a greater effort.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not give in to a negative attitude. Tackle the task at hand promptly; escapist diversions will only prolong your worry. Be wary of offers that promise something for nothing.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): The emphasis today is on respecting family's needs. Curb your attention-getting side and let others take center stage for a change. Treat yourself and the one you love to a romantic evening.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Career and domestic changes lie just ahead. You are stimulated by variety and should seek challenging assignments. At last, you are getting out of a rut! Your spirits should soar by evening.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Work pressures could affect your frame of mind. Procedural mistakes or customer complaints could slow you down. Be flexible. You will have the entire weekend to plan a new strategy.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): An ideal day to promote creative ventures. Take care of any breakdowns in appliances, transportation or communications. Accept any last-minute invitations. Someone special is eager to meet you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You could be asked to deal with the public or lead a group undertaking. Show your leadership qualities; emphasize the benefits of teamwork. Assist someone who has helped you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): An unusual arrangement or joint financial deal may be needed to wipe out a debt. Act quickly to straighten out a credit matter. You could be asked to make a difficult choice.

THEATER

A different side of Ireland explored

By MICHAEL T. PUOPOLO, II
Collegian Correspondent

Ireland is a country torn by religious beliefs, but in Tullyatin Crossed the conflict was different. The Tinkers are bands of Irish gypsies and nomads with a pagan religion. The Catholic Church dislikes the Tinkers and their religion. These two different perspectives on religion clashed and tore a family apart in the process.

Tullyatin Crossed was an original play by graduate playwriting and directing student Anna Dolen, and directed by graduate student Joshua Perlstein. It was a different and interesting drama with occasional comic relief.

It would have helped the play if there were more segues into scenes. The play itself gave a different perspective on family life in other environments, among other things. Even though the theme of the play was a common motif, the way in which the theme was presented to the audience was what made it so interesting.

The cast of Tullyatin Crossed was strong. All of the actors were believable for the unreal circumstances they had to make believable. They handled the possession scenes well also. Sarah Whitehead, Paul M. Couzyn, Katie Johnson, Teresa O'Brien, and Sean David Cloherty gave the strongest performances. Each actor was unique in their respective interpretation of the character. Some of the best and most endearing scenes were when Michael and Fiona were playing "Tinker Family," and any scene with Sally seducing Kiren; and the Exorcist like possessions. The actors also did not break concentration and managed to work around the broken door on the set.

There were a few minor problems. The play was too big for the theater. There was no depth in the set. However, that was the theaters fault, not the designers. Since the play was "fourth wall" I disliked the fact that the actors made several entrances through the audience. There were also occasional slips of accents. And I could not figure out why Sally started dancing around to country western music in front of the house. There was no defined point for this action.

Technically speaking, the sound was excellent. The eerie undertones and animal noises were perfect, and the cows mooing during the sex scene was hysterical. The rotating house was also a nice effect. The set was convincing and dirty as it was supposed to be.

Overall, it was an enjoyable evening. Perlstein chose just the right actors for the roles and worked well with them.

Junkie scratches his global itch

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

One of the major problems facing would-be disk junkies all over this great land of ours is the problem of availability. The stuff just isn't there when you want it. Our quest for aural stimulation was thwarted by release dates that didn't materialize, and import records that just refuse to cross that big wide ocean of ours. But we thrive on adversity, so feast your eyes on this week's bag of tricks. . .

The Chicago industrial sound is loved by some, hated by many, and totally unheard of to still more. Those in the know will speak glowingly of tougher than diamonds drum tracks and aural Brillo guitars, synths and vocals.

One of the key figures behind the entire scene is Alain Jourgensen, who plays, or has played, a role in Ministry, Pailhead, Lard, Skinny Puppy, Revolting Cocks, and 1000 Homo DJs, to name a few. For unknown reasons he is now trading under the name "Alien Jourgensen" and he and his cohorts have put out another Ministry album.

Called The Mind Is A Terrible Thing To Taste, the music will sound reassuringly familiar to fans of last year's influential work, The Land of Rape and Honey. It's much more of a refinement than a redirection, but the formula still has life in it. The album kicks off with "Thieves," which veers between death grunge and speed metal with alarming abandon. The screech and the scream will make your pet dog howl in pain, but if you crank the album enough you won't be able to tell where Jourgensen's vocals leave off and your poor dog's begin. Our major complaint is that it's all very similar sounding, with not much individuality to the different songs. All in all, it's fairly satisfying, although if you are a newcomer, you might want to check out Rape and Honey first.

DISC JUNKIE

On the more melodic side of things, there's a new compilation on C'est La Mort records called Doctor Death's Volume III. C'est La Mort are responsible for bringing into this country some of the best European synth pop, and this volume should serve as good introduction to anyone interested in finding out what the independent scene across the pond has to offer. Featuring tracks by Canada's Front Line Assembly, as well as British bands like Beautiful Pea Green Boat and Drowning Pool, it showcases the current state of this type of music. Standout tracks include the haunting "Day at the Dreamies" by Legendary Pink Dots and "Black Souls Under White Skies" by Bill Pritchard. C'est La Mort's albums are somewhat difficult to locate, but their continuous commitment to quality music makes them definitely worth the effort.

Artist Ibarra does her father proud

By JOHN SUTTON
Collegian Correspondent

Growing up surrounded by her father's art and instructed by him, Rosa Ibarra was heavily influenced to continue painting, making her a second generation painter in her family. On Nov. 20, the New Africa House will be displaying the art of Rosa Ibarra.

Her passion for painting represents her feelings on canvas. Many of her works depict large, exaggerated women of different colors together in joyous activities.

"I am always aware of women as the great species that they are. I know that life is sometimes hard, like now for me," she laughed, referring to her domestic responsibilities of raising three young girls, cooking for her family and going to school committee meetings.

Ibarra enjoys using bright colors in her art, which she takes from artist Paul Gaughin. Gaughin's art used human figures and made up compositions with bright colors. Ibarra uses different colors for her women who are painted pink, green, blue and red, adding variety to the whole painting. She said she likes Gaughin because he's not abstract.

"I see (Gaughin's) use of color and how he developed ideas from his mind," she said.

Her picture titled "Dancing Women" is of exaggerated large and colorful women dancing. "Sometimes, women can be happy just dancing," Ibarra said.

Ibarra has lived in many cultures in Puerto Rico, Paris and five years later in Asia, where she says that she saw the women together in peace.

Last spring Ibarra worked with her father, Alfonso Arana. She says that many people compare her to her father, which creates a lot of pressure to produce good quality. "My father has always been socially active and taught free classes where I participated when I was five-years-old," she said.

Although following in her father's footsteps, Ibarra uses her mother's name. "I told him it would be better because I want to make it on my own," she said.

Ibarra grew up in the old capital of San Juan, Puetro Rico. "I'm Puerto Rican, but I feel I am an artist of the world — an international artist," Ibarra said. "Many artists feel that their art should only be in their own culture. That's alright, but I think it should go beyond that," she said, pointing out the fact that she would translate the titles for the local or foreign viewer's understanding.

Titles to her art work come easily to Ibarra. "I do a little sketch and a title comes to me," she said. "I don't know if it will be like that forever, but lately the title pops right up."

Ibarra describes her art as fine art, that which goes through the academy and is done through feeling. Unlike commercial art, it is mainly done for pleasure.

When looking for a subject, Ibarra occasionally goes through old National Geographic.

"I like to make the human being larger, to exaggerate. You have to know the anatomy so it will fuse to the eye."

Her painting, "Birth of Venus" depicts the mythological goddess of love (Aphrodite), in her perception, waiting to leave the circular womb. Venus appears to be a giant waiting to be born and reign throughout the universe.

"Painting takes a lot of energy," Ibarra said. "When my father was painting, no one could talk to him. There was so much respect for him. I still get frustrated when and he's been painting for 50 years. I never saw him doing the dishes. No one disturbed him when he was painting. For me, everyone (in the house) is going, Rosa, Rosa you have to do this and that."

UM students join millions in 'Smokeout'

By LISA MILLEGAN
Collegian Correspondent

Millions of Americans yesterday chose to give up or cut back on cigarettes for 24 hours in conjunction with the 13th annual Great American Smokeout.

The American Cancer Society, which is sponsoring the event, hopes that 20 percent of the nation's 5 million smokers chose to breathe to breath clean air yesterday, said Nick Ingala, chairman of the American Cancer Society's Massachusetts Division.

Ingala said although people usually must try several times before they can permanently give up cigarettes, he said he thinks the smokeout can help them try.

"The Great American Smokeout is a light-hearted celebration that creates an atmosphere of public support for quitters," he said. "The positive tide can help carry people through the difficult moments when the craving for nicotine strikes."

John Edwards, a sophomore at the University of Massachusetts, and a smoker, said he agrees that the smokeout can help people quit.

"I think its a good idea. I know that's how my mom quit," he said. "If [smokers] are thinking of quitting, that's how it gets them started." He added, "I don't want to quit but I think I will stop smoking during the Smokeout just for the hell of it."

UMass junior and smoker Jennifer Morrill echoed Edwards' sentiments about the smokeout.

"I'm not going to do it, but I think it's great," she said.

Ingala said the smokeout focused on convincing young children not to start.

More than 50 percent of all current adult smokers were already hooked on cigarettes when they were 13, he said.

Death penalty may live (maybe)

BOSTON (AP) — A bill reinstating the death penalty in Massachusetts must pass through a wall of amendments before the Senate can vote on it, including one requiring juries to witness the executions they order.

The sensation surrounding recent homocides — in particular the inner-city attack on a suburban couple that left a pregnant mother and her baby dead — have given new life to the death penalty debate, and may have changed at least one senator's mind.

But capital punishment has never proven to be a deterrent to crime, according to opponents who concede the bill likely will pass the Senate, but have filed 18 amendments to delay action or weaken the bill. Gov. Dukakis has said he will veto any death penalty bill.

Action on the measure was delayed Wednesday on a motion by Sen. Edward Burke, D-Framingham.

The state's death penalty statute has been stalled since the state Supreme Court struck it down as discriminatory because it allowed those who plead guilty to escape a death sentence. The commonwealth's last execution was in 1947.

Murders committed with premediation or extreme cruelty would fall under the new law.

Sen. Bill Owens, D-Boston, filed the amendment requiring juries to witness death sentences they impose.

"We feel that the death penalty may not be administered fairly, and if people are going to be willing to go support the death penalty they ought to be willing to witness persons being executed," Owens said.

Owens said he did not believe capital punishment is a deterrent, but he said jurors who witness executions could return to the community to describe what they saw and share their perceptions.

Last hurrah for UMass football team tomorrow

Minutemen face UNH at McGuirk

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Last season, the University of Massachusetts football team went into the final game of the regular season with a chance to tie for the Yankee Conference title and a shot at a berth in the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

The opponent was the University of New Hampshire. The Minutemen trekked to Durham, N.H., got caught in a whirlwind of a game and came out with a wild 64-42 win that gave them the share of the Beanpot and put them in the playoffs for the first time in 10 years.

Now, a year later, it's payback time for New Hampshire. The Wildcats, whom UMass coach Jim Reid calls "the hottest team in the conference, and maybe in the nation in Division I-AA," ride the crest of a seven-game win streak into town tomorrow for a 1 p.m. match at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Nothing is guaranteed at this time. UNH (7-2 overall, 5-2 in the YanCon) can't win the league's automatic bid to the playoffs — Maine has already captured that. But a committee of athletic directors will meet in Kansas City this weekend and pick 10 teams to receive at-large bids. New Hampshire, like UMass in '88, is one of the teams with crossed fingers.

"If they win against us, they should represent the conference in the playoffs," Reid said.

But if 'Cats coach Bill Bowes and his staff had any say in the matter, UMass would probably be the last team they'd want to be playing tomorrow — outside of maybe Colorado or Notre Dame.

Three times in this decade, UNH has had a chance to wrap up at least a share of the YC crown, but the Minutemen shot down those chances on every occasion. In 1986, UMass pushed its way to a tie for the title with the win.

Ask anyone about what makes the 'Cats tick, and the answer clearly has to be senior first-year quarterback Mark Carr. In the season's first two games, Carr was sidelined with mononucleosis, and UNH dropped key conference games to Maine and Connecticut.

In Week 3, Carr (136-for-248, 1,806 yards and 10 touchdowns) returned to lead his troops past Delaware, and it's been nonstop ever since.

"We are in the position we want to be in," Bowes said. "When we were 0-2 we knew we had to win the rest of our games. We now have that opportunity."

But the whole trip hasn't been just by Carr. The 'Cats have ridden a Ford — tailback Norm Ford, who has rushed for 907 yards and scored 11 touchdowns. Carr has solid targets in split ends Rob Spittel and John Perry and flanker Chris Braune.

"They are as solid a team as there is in the conference," Reid said. "I thought they had the best team in the conference last year, but they had some real bad breaks and finished 6-5."

This year, the 'Cats have been making the breaks themselves. Shawn Lane's field goal lifted them past Villanova, 13-12, in a key game two weeks ago, and then there was the incredible comeback at Northeastern, where a 28-6 deficit with a minute left in the third quarter quickly turned into a 31-28 win.

In last year's game, New Hampshire had the toughest defense in the league and posed a huge threat to the Minutemen, but UMass ripped that to shreds by running up 649 yards of total offense.

"Last year we had one guy who had a career day — Dave Palazzi," Reid said. "If they score 42 this year, we will not win, and they have the potential to do that."

So defense is the key. Reid thought, despite allowing 29 points in last week's setback at Villanova, that his defense played as well as it has all year, save for a couple of big plays that turned the game around.

The University of Massachusetts football team wraps up its 1989 season tomorrow at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium against the University of New Hampshire.

Offensively, the Minutemen are hoping that redshirt freshman quarterback Gary Wilkos can continue to light it up both on the ground and in the air. Last week Wilkos topped the 100-yard mark in both categories and also scored three touchdowns, the first time a UM quarterback has done that since Brian McNally pulled it off against Rhode Island in 1975. But McNally carried only five times for five yards in that game.

Wilkos, however, has been banged up all week, as he has all year. He has recovered from a groin injury suffered last weekend, but since discovered a broken navicular bone in his left wrist.

"He's gonna give it a shot," Reid said. "He's got a cast on his arm that's hindering him a little, but not as much as anticipated. I just don't know. He's been practicing OK, a little sloppy. But in a game, one bad pitch or dropped snap and it's a little worse. You don't get a second chance."

Tailback Jerome Bledsoe is definitely out, having taken a helmet to the knee last week. He will probably have his knee scoped after the season ends.

Split end Chip Mitchell, who broke the all-time receiving record last week with 1,590 career yards, needs nine receptions tomorrow for a record 109 for his career. It will be his last chance, as he is one of eight seniors who will be playing in their final game.

Also bidding farewell tomorrow are cornerback Garrick Amos, linebackers Drew Comeau, Sean Cummings and George Karelas, nose guard Joe Cullen, tailback Steve Olson and guard Pat Phillips.

Thus, the Minutemen will be looking to give these guys a good send-off, as well as derailing New Hampshire again and leading into a promising 1990 season on a positive note.

Women's swimming to take on Maine Sunday

Minutewomen try to rebound from tough loss to UConn last weekend

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Correspondent

Will the real UMass women's swimming team please stand up?

After two convincing victories over Smith college and the University?ho simply had too much depth for UMass.

Sunday afternoon the lady swimmers travel to Maine for a dual in the pool with the University of Maine. Before the season, UMass coach Bob Newcomb looked at this meet as a key to the season for his squad. How big is this meet? When you consider the fact that only Michele Leary has swam with any consistency, (she has won every race that she has competed in this season), this Sunday's meet is a key one for the Minutewomen.

Captain Keira Cruz and diver Stephanie Tuttle both competed well last weekend and another positive outing this weekend could prove to be a very big confidence builder for the sophomores.

Thus far, freshman Kari Edwardsen has been the biggest surprise for UMass, she has set personal bests in each of her two meets, but last weekend's performance was not good enough for first place. Look for Edwardsen to continue her impressive back stroking and possibly for a win in the competition in Maine.

Newcomb was pleased with his swimmers' performances last weekend but the fact still remains that UMass was unable to defeat a club that Newcomb had planned on beating this season en route to his dream season (10-1).

Now the question is, is this team as good as Newcomb believed it was before the season? UMass could silence the critics until after Thanksgiving with a win in Maine, but a loss would be devastating to UMass' chances of improving on last seasons 8-4 mark.

This meet along with the race against Springfield College will be the last two competitions before 1990 rolls in. The significance of this is that UMass will be out of the pool for quite a while, and a loss to Maine and or Springfield could be psychologically demoralizing.

Newcomb's crew is lucky that the schedule is not reversed, since Springfield should not be nearly as tough a contest as this weekend's affair.

The attitude at practice has been intense, as the Minutewomen know they will take this performance with them into the holiday. A qualifying time for the Nationals would be nice, (are you listening Michele Leary?) but if no records are set, a win against Maine, will be enough for the time being.

With Turkey day less than a week away, the Minutewomen must focus and feast on Maine. If the Minutewomen come out flat, it will surely be a long bus ride home, and an even longer vacation. This meet will separate the real swimmers from the lapsters.

Men's swimming team to open season

Minutemen head to BC ready for tough early test

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team opens its season tonight as the Minutemen take on the Boston College Eagles. The team will open on the road as UMass travels to Natick for a 7 p.m. meet.

"We've got a great rivalry with these guys," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "We've had some good meets with them in the past."

The Minutemen opened last year's season with the Eagles as well. Coach Yarworth's team had a 41-meet unbeaten streak on the line when BC strolled into Boyden Pool. Boston College came in to the meet tapered and shaved, while UMass did not. The Eagles swam away with an upset victory.

"Boston College did us a favor last year," said Yarworth. "I didn't have to motivate my kids about working hard and getting ready the rest of the season."

UMass and Boston College met again in the New Englands last season, but things were just a bit different the second time around. The Minutemen's New England title was on the line, something they were not going to give up. UMass crushed the Eagles by 400 points, and went on to win their third straight New England Championship.

"We are very, very psyched for this meet," said Yarworth. "The kids are ready, they want it."

The fact that Boston College came into the first meet of the season tapered and shaved surprised coach Yarworth. This year he is ready and waiting for anything that the Eagles want to throw at him.

"My feeling is that BC won't be shaved, but they surprised me last year with it," said Yarworth. "They like to beat us, and they are not going to beat us in the New Englands. If they come in shaved, we're ready for it. We'll pounce on 'em."

The Eagles are loaded with quality swimmers, but Maarten Kraaijvanger is their best. He has caused some problems for the Minutemen in the past. Boston College will also be helped by Rob Strong and Todd Hewitt. None of the Eagles are a mystery to Yarworth though.

"We know them well, we're just going to go out there with our strongest lineup." said Yarworth. "They have some excellent swimmers, so it's going to be a good meet."

Field hockey players named All-Northeast

Five members from the University of Massachusetts field hockey team have been named to the All-Northeast Region team.

Senior Kathy DeAngelis, who led the Minutewomen in scoring this season with 15 goals and three assists was named to the first team. Joining her on the first team from UMass were sweeper Kerri Fagan, forward Mara Frattasio (13 goals, one assist), and goaltender Phillipa Scott.

Senior back Bernadette Martel was named to the second team.

About 3,000 students form a human chain stretching a mile and a half from the Student Union to Amherst Common, ending a weeklong boycott of classes.

3,000 take a walk, end boycott

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Some 3,000 students joined hands and walked single file to Amherst Common Friday, marking the end of what organizers deemed successful, a five-day class boycott against repeated cuts to public higher education.

Almost 1,000 students stopped at the Amherst Post Office en route to the common and mailed letters to state legislators urging them not to make additional cuts to higher education and instead opt for a progressive tax package.

About 300 members of the undergraduate student body met Thursday night and voted overwhelmingly to end the strike Friday.

Organizers said although the strike is over students will continue to fight for a progressive tax package and an end to cuts to public higher education and the social and human services by writing letters and lobbying legislators in Boston and in their hometowns.

Kathy Taylor, Union of Undergraduate member said, "Today we are declaring a victory for the strike."

Mark Kenen, student coordinator of the leadership coalition said, "We, as graduate students have been together since the end of August and we saw there was no one leading this campus from Whitmore. And it needs to be done."

He said the graduate students are now joined with the Union of Undergraduates and the struggle will be pushed forward as of this morning.

He thanked the undergraduate students for putting themselves and their classes on the line and deemed the strike a "tremendous success."

Students, faculty, and workers joined together at the Student Union steps before the procession to downtown Amherst to celebrate the success of the strike.

Tom Kotch, a professional staff union member, citing the recent slayings of six Jesuit priests and two nuns in San Salvador said in past protests on campus, the U.S. government was the enemy but now it's the state government.

He said the United States aids El Salvador and it would be money better spent on education.

John Cole, president of the faculty union said, "We have 6,000 new actors on the political scene in Massachusetts."

Budget ax being felt across state

By MICHAEL WESTER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst is not the only campus in Massachusetts to feel the crunch of the budget crisis, but other state colleges are not willing to strike against the repeated cuts.

Student leaders and administrators at other state colleges in the state are cutting back, increasing fees and promoting student activism to deal with the fiscal woes.

Brian Kelly, treasurer of the Student Government Association at the University of Lowell, said students have written letters and called to their legislators urging them not to make further cuts to higher education.

Kelly said students have mixed reactions to the UMass strike.

"Myself and other members of the executive board wanted to form some sort of reaction to what is going on [at UMass]," he said. "We drafted a letter to be sent to your school in support of the strike."

However, Kelly noted an editorial written in the student newspaper against the strike as evidence that not all the students support it.

"People here are far more cautious about how to deal with this," he said. "They tend to be more middle-of-the-road."

Frederick P. Sperounis, vice president for University Relations and Development, said dealing with a restricted budget is nothing new for ULowell.

"In the last 24 months, we've given back $7.5 million—a net loss in the form of reversions," he said. "Our budget is $7.5 million less than it was two years ago."

The student body last Spring asked the University's Board of Trustees for a fee increase to compensate for the reversion.

Sperounis said the students supported the increase in fees because "they simply did not want to see the value in the currency of their degree go down."

"They understand that dollar for dollar they're getting a great education," he said.

Catherine A. Tisinger, president of North Adams State College, said in order to deal with their reversions, the North Adams Board of Trustees instituted a one-time only $300 emergency curriculum fee.

As a means to save money, administrators chose to leave several staff positions vacant this past year instead of laying off staff, she said.

"As of September, ten percent of authorized positions were vacant," Tisinger said. Only part-time faculty and administrative positions have been affected, she said.

"We're not taking on part-time faculty that we would have normally hired in the Spring," she said.

The college has had to cancel a fairly large number of course sections for the Spring semester, especially in the

Key bills hit Senate

Reps: higher ed in state of emergency

By NATHAN KRYSTALL

Two bills that would reduce the impact of the budget crisis on public higher education have passed the Massachusetts House of Representatives and are pending before the State Senate, said Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst.

The bills could reduce next semester's possible $525 fee hike for University of Massachusett students. However, Rosenberg said he is not sure when the Senate will vote on the bills.

The representatives declared that public higher education is in a state of emergency Thursday at 1:30 a.m., Rosenberg said.

"The declaration puts the representatives on the record as recognizing the crisis in higher education and commits us to restoring funds to the system," Rosenberg said. "It also commits us to developing a long term, secure financing commitment to higher education."

The legislators voted last month to eliminate $25 million from statewide higher education's fiscal 1990 budget,

Officer: racism rooted in White supremacy

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Staff

Racism is a global system of power, whereby education, economics, entertainment and politics are used as a means of achieving White supremacy, according to a medical officer of the Department of Human Resources in Washington D.C.

Dr. Frances Cress Welsing spoke on White supremacy Saturday at the Campus Center Auditorium. The lecture was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program's Afrocentric Lecture Series.

Welsing said White supremacist racism is the primary source of racism, and all other forms of racism are secondary, springing from the root of White supremacism.

White supremacy is rooted in the subconscious fear of genetic annihilation that some White people have based on two facts: White people compose only 10 percent of the world population, and the Expert:CIA agenda 'thugs and drugs'

Covert action differs from espionage

By THOMAS A. GEORGE
Collegian Correspondant

"Thugs and Drugs" are the main facets of CIA covert operations overseas, said Greg Treverton, a member of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations.

"What I'm talking about is covert actions - major efforts to influence the politics of a foreign government," he said. "This must be distinguished from espionage, which is more along the lines of small scale intelligence gathering."

The effort in Nicaragua, essentially aid to the Contras, was deemed as a "limited, messy, partial success, in that the Contra movement toward the bargaining table with the Sandanistas might not have happened without the support of the United States," he said.

"The official purpose [In Nicaragua] was never clearly pointed out, the idea wasn't just to get rid of the Sandinistas, but that was just assumed," Treverton said. Arms sales to Iran to fund the Contras was clearly marked as a failure, but Treverton used the incident to illustrate the policy of "plausible denial."

"Plausible denial is an operation constructed not exactly as a secret, but the administration can plausibly deny its involvement. The best way to do this is to keep the president ignorant," he said.

Treverton also dicussed Panama, another hot spot in Central America. "While it seems a failure, it really wasn't anything like a covert operation at all, things were done rather overtly there." he said.

Treverton referred to the United States military forces. "While they do lots of things well, not much can be done quietly," he said.

As in the case of Nicaragua, and applicable to all such occurrences, Treverton said, "If you have a covert operation that is part of a large controversial foreign policy, the covert operation becomes controversial, and in no way will remain a secret."

There are a number of questions that Treverton said he believes politicians must ask themselves before trying to sell their ideas for covert operations to Congress.

"First off, you must assume that the idea will become public. Will the politicians be ready to stand by it once it is in the open and under fire?" he asked. "Is it in contrast with existing US foreign policy?"

Treverton said he sees the role of Congress as crucial. If a politician has trouble trying to present a foreign policy idea, "it might not just be the salesman or the sales job; it is the policy."

Food for the hungry comes by the ton

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group collected a ton of food for the needy on Saturday, according to one of the group's workers.

Jenifer Wood, a member of the MassPIRG Hunger Project, said Saturday's food drive began at 10 a.m. in four different locations, and by 4 p.m. one ton of food had been donated by shoppers.

"Shoppers were given a list of food that people need," said Wood, a first year zoology student at the University of Massachusetts, "and on their way out, they donated it to us."

"It was a very big success," she said. "In the past we've only gotten half a ton."

The food bins were located outside two different Stop and Shops, Price Chopper and Louis' Foods, she said.

Wood said the food will be donated to the Greenfield Survival Center and other local hunger relief projects.

The food drive was a rap-up to Hunger and Homelessness Week, which is an annual nationwide event, she said.

"Due to economic problems, people can't earn enough money to maintain their families in a way that our society accepts as healthy or suitable," Wood said.

business and English departments, she said.

"Because we're a small institution, we have to be very careful," Tisinger said. "We have not closed any programs yet, and we hope we do not have to."

Theresa O'Neill, managing editor of North Adams State's newspaper, The Beacon, said students at her campus realize the necessity of fee increases to maintain the quality of the institution.

"Most students are in favor of digging into their pockets," she said.

She said they are also aware of UMass' recent actions to fight the cuts, and have taken similar actions on their own.

O'Neill said students at North Adams State do not support striking, but she cited letter drives to legislators and participation in the Oct. 18 State House rally as ways in which the student body has tried to make their voices heard.

Daniel Mark Harrington, president of the Worcester State College Student Government Association, said the student senate there also does not support a strike.

The Senate last week defeated a proposal to have a one-day walkout on Monday, Nov. 27 that was designed in part to show support for students at UMass, Harrington said.

Harrington added, "Just because the walkout was defeated doesn't mean we're not behind UMass students."

Harrington said he believes the proposal was rejected because the senate thought the students would perceive the walkout as an extra day of Thanksgiving vacation rather than a valid protest.

Harrington added that the budget crisis has not affected Worcester State as much as other campuses, although the students will pay a $145 one-time emergency curriculum fee next spring.

Maurice Poirier, director of Community Services at Worcester State said the fee is designed to offset the $1.5 million loss to the college in the past two years.

"Fortunately, we have a very conservative president here. He's been very conservative in hiring," Poirier said. "As a result, [the president] has been able to maintain low fees for the students," he said.

Worcester State's $156 per semester fee is the lowest of any state college, according to Poirier.

which resulted in the Board of Trustees voting to raise student fees by $350 to compensate for the cut.

However, Rosenberg said the declaration does not specify the amount of money that would be restored.

"What I'm fighting for is $25 million," he said.

In addition, legislators sent another bill to the senate that would partially reverse a proposal to raise student fees by another $175, Rosenberg said. The proposal demands students to assume fringe benefit costs for campus services.

"The bill reduces the impact on students by more than a third," he said. If passed, the $175 fee would be reduced to $100, he said, adding that he hopes the senate will eliminate the fringe benefit proposal altogether.

Rosenberg said representatives originally planned to delay working on a tax package until after legislators had tried to balance the budget by cutting state programs. But, he said, Beacon Hill is starting to realize the necessity of raising taxes.

"We're talking with the [Statehouse] leadership about putting together a tax package," he said. "We can't wait for the senate to begin taking action on the savings package."

genetic information that produces white skin is a recessive trait, she said.

She further questioned the term "minority" as applied to non-White people when 90/ of humanity is non-White.

Welsing cited deficiency of melanin as the genetic source of White skin, which she refered to as the condition of "skin albinism." According to Welsing, the genetic information which carries this trait is recessive to the melanin production trait which exists in non-Whites.

Welsing related the projection that because of the reccessive genes of White people and their minority status in the world's population, White people will be a minority in the United States in 6 to 9 generations.

The fear which these facts generates in Whites causes them to consciuously or sub-consciously seek to destroy non-Whites in a variety of ways. According to Welsing, this is the reason behind White supremacist racism.

Are 'Happy Days' returning?

Marge (not her real name) developed a crush on a guy at a meeting of a student organization of which they are both active members. A shy person, she admired him from afar for weeks, wondering how to "make her move."

Alise Harfield

Joyce (not her real name, either) became accustomed to spotting the same (in her opinion, quite good looking) guy in the places she most frequented. Through mutual friends she discovered he was a nice person. She became interested. But what would she do now?

They both had options. Being two shy folks they could have suppressed their feelings, and waited until he "accidentally" found out, and hoped he would take some initiative. Or they could admit and address their feelings and ask him out.

But where? At the meeting, where the rest of the group could hear, and potentially guffaw? And how? On the phone? How would she furtively secure the correct phone number? Get by the blockade of over-curios roommates? Manage the first "hello?"

Needless to say, life for weeks became frustratingly difficult for Marge and Joyce.

Both seniors, they had spent over three years in the midst of the college dating/waiting scene. As such they had seen all the tactics — dressing up and going in herds to fraternity parties, where they swallow sufficient cups of beer that somehow gives them the guts not to necessarily ask others out. Instead, they take them home in a drunken stupor, or follow their "crush" to his hangout, (then making it their hang-out), adopting the same habits as he — just for his attention.

But none of these "old" options appealed to them. What if their assumptions based only on his appearance (seems like a nice guy, polite, intelligent) were wrong? Why risk anything?

So they did what they could. Studying and going about their daily lives afforded them the opportunity to keep bumping into their "friends." In due course, all four got to know one another better. Marge and Joyce were happy to discover before going out with them that their original hunches were correct — the guys were nice.

Not long after, their wishes were fulfilled. Marge's friend drove over to her apartment, nicely dressed and took her out for dinner. After a successful date and getting to know one another better, Joyce and her friend shared a homemade dinner. Sort of sounds like Richie Cunningham and Lori Beth from Happy Days, doesn't it?

A few years ago, Marge and Joyce might have succumbed to their lack of guts during sobriety, gotten utterly drunk and "scooped" him, waited to see if it worked out afterwards and if it did not, blamed the whole travesty on their blood-alcohol ratio, then called it a day.

But they did not. Their interests did not become a one-night stand, or something worse that tends to emerge from such. They took the time to get to know the other person before going out with them. I would guess the "getting-to-know-you" stage was worth its agony. It may have been a fun precursory.

I was glad to hear of their fortune and successful tactics. Maybe a return to the ways of the portrayed 50s isn't a bad idea. These days, it would be anything but risky.

To the students: we understand

The Executive Committee of the Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations wishes to express its admiration and respect for the energy, ingenuity and civility shown by students working to protect their university.

We believe that in spite of disagreement over tactics inevitable in such large scale and spontaneous activity, this has been a classic example of the legitimate exercise of the rights of peaceable assembly and the presentation of grievances as guaranteed by the constitution.

We believe that these activities have had a major impact not only on the Legislature, but also on the citizens of the Commonwealth at large, increasing their awareness of the severity of the threat of damage to the University.

We realize how these recent events have interfered with the students' capacity to concentrate on academic work. We understand the sacrifice that these activities have entailed and the additional pressures they have placed on students already carrying a heavy burden of concern for their futures.

It is critical that students know that the community understands such pressures. We are also struggling with our own version of them. We are eager to emphasize our confidence that whatever preoccupations seem to separate us, the campus community is united in resistance to the dismantling of public higher education.

Executive Committee of the Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations

Let's eliminate the snowball effect

I am writing to ask your help. A snowball fight with students at Amherst College during the first snowfall has come to be an annual event. Unfortunately, the event is no longer "good clean fun," but a destructive activity. Serious injury and extensive property damage have resulted from snowball fights.

We hope that students will stop, once they are educated about its true nature. Although the administrations of both Amherst College and UMass believe that students will turn this situation around, we are preparing to work with town authorities to stop the fight, should it occur this year. Charges through the campus disciplinary systems will be pursued as appropriate.

Understanding that this campaign against the snowball fight will not be an easy task, I am most appreciative of your help. Thank you in advance.

Holding on . . . from within

A week and a half ago, I lost my grandfather. He passed away suddenly, with no warning, and the news shocked and numbed my family.

My grandfather has seemed immortal to me over the years. He was a pillar of strength, the backbone of the family. He was bigger than life, but one of the most gentle people on earth. He seldom was angry, never judged anyone, and would always help someone in need, friend or stranger. He had his own religion: one of kindness.

Gayle Long

I can still remember the last time that I saw my grandfather. It was little over a month ago, and I was home escaping the pressures of school. My grandparents came to see me, and throughout dinner, he continually asked about me: my grades, my friends, what I was involved in. He never complained about his health, or discussed the problems he was having.

I have many vivid memories of the 19 years that I spent with my grandfather. As a child, my grandfather seemed as tall as the Prudential building, and being lifted into his arms, I felt that I could see everything in the entire world. I can still see my grandfather watching the Red Sox and cheering for Yaz. I can still picture him checking the tomatoes and cucumbers in his garden and building toyboxes and playhouses for his grandchildren and great-grandchildren. Knowing that I cannot just pick up the phone and call him, talk to him and see how he is, leaves a void inside of me. It is a terribly empty space.

Why do people come in and out of our lives? It seems that as soon as the relationship is cemented, permanent and eternal, the other person is gone, out of sight and unattainable. We must accept that no one will always be there. Everyone eventually leaves in one way or another. My grandparents were married almost 50 years, and my grandmother has lost the one person dearer to her than all the world. He was her best friend, her lover, her counsel and her support.

I am so afraid of having to go through what my grandmother is experiencing now. Fifty years is too long to just let go. After such a period of time, she cannot just let go and start again. He was her life and she was his. They experienced the joys of seeing three generations of family born, and dealt with the sorrow of losing two grandchildren. But they never lost faith in each other, and shared their strengths and weaknesses.

These people that are so important to us now, how will they leave us? When? Or will they? Or are the most important people still yet to enter our lives? How will our friends, roommates, classmates and associates figure into our lives in five, ten, twenty years? I am afraid of people coming in and out of my life, but I am more frightened of not having a relationship that I treasure and will remember and benefit from. So I will continue to make friends, get close to people, and spend time with my family. All that I meet and know will come in and out of my life, and still life will go on. The chance of spending 50 years with someone is slim, but I hope and pray that I can share such a large part of my life with someone I love.

Now that my grandfather has passed out of my life and the lives of all of my family, we will all remember him in our own way. There will be something special about each of us that is and always will be a part of him. I did not really say good-bye to him, but now I believe that I do not have to. He is still with me.

Irresponsible accusations

Lisa Nelson, a UMass student who helped organize last week's strike, should consider the ramifications of her statements before slandering anyone else with her careless criticisms.

Paul Morris

In front of about 2,000 people at a rally Friday afternoon, Nelson shouted through a megaphone that a page one story in last Friday's Collegian headlined, "Students: strike ends Monday," (Nov. 17) contained quotes from all men. She incited the crowd by asking, "Are the organizers of this strike all men?" The crowd yelled back in one deafening voice, "NOOOOOOO!"

I wrote the story, and those two irresponsible sentences by Nelson instantly damaged my credibility and unfairly labeled me a sexist to about 2,000 teachers, students and staff members, some of whom I deal with every day.

Nelson, who was in charge of press relations for the strikers, did not tell the crowd that she declined to comment when I questioned her Monday and Tuesday. She said she was too busy.

After the Graduate Employees Organization voted to back the strike Wednesday, I asked Liz Hart, a strike organizer, to comment on behalf of the Union of Undergraduates. She told me she was not authorized to speak on behalf of the strikers, but that David Golovner, who happens to be a man, was. Angus McQuilken had also told me earlier in the week that he was authorized to speak for the Union of Undergraduates. Both Golovner and McQuilken were available and willing to comment at the meeting to end the strike Thursday. The three UMass students were also quoted in the story because their ideas were interesting, not because they were men.

I wrote 11 strike-related stories since the student boycott was announced Nov. 8. Of those, 16 women were quoted, and at least one was represented in each story.

Five of the women were identified as leaders of organizations that supported the strike. They are: Renee Heberle, co-spokesperson for the Graduate Employees Organization; Catalina Castillon Dodson, the president of the Graduate Student Senate; Tracy Davis, the president of the Student Government Association; Carol Knox, a vice president of District 65 United Auto Workers and Binky Feldman, Union of Undergraduates strike organizer.

Three other women were identified as women who organized voter registration, they were: Angelika Schwolow, Susan Laing and Lisa O'Brien.

I can sympathize with Nelson's concern about ending the stereotype that women are not leaders, but she was completely irresponsible to identify the story, and in effect me, as sexist, without doing any research.

Immediately after Nelson spoke, I confronted her and tried to explain the story to her. Nelson said, "Probably none of the people in the articles were Black or Hispanic either," insinuating that my stories are written with a racist, as well as sexist, slant. She had no basis for her accusations. She had just defamed me twice in three minutes, but said she had no time to explain her rationale to me, and ran into the Student Union.

If the Union of Undergraduates plan to become an effective statewide lobbying group for students' political concerns its leaders must act much more responsibly than Lisa Nelson has.

A STATEMENT TO THE STUDENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AND AMHERST COLLEGE

In recent years, some University of Massachusetts students have, on the occasion of the first winter snowfall, marched in large numbers to the Amherst College campus for what has at times been described as an "old traditional" snowball fight. What must have begun as a relatively benign event has, in recent years, become increasingly violent, destructive and dangerous. In the past several years, the result has been more than $10,000 damage to Amherst College property. It is apparent that in many cases this damage has been caused by deliberately throwing snowballs or rocks through dormitories and office windows. Several injuries have also occurred.

The most serious injury occurred last winter when an Amherst College freshman was struck in the eye by a snowball. There is some evidence that the snowball may have contained a rock and there is clear evidence that rocks packed in snow were used to smash windows on that occasion. The freshman student had to undergo emergency surgery to save an eye. In the light of this incident it has become clear to us that we can no longer tolerate the continuation of this "tradition."

We were cheered during the fall when some University of Massachusetts and Amherst College students conspired to "re-ritualize" this event into a good-natured songfest. Nonetheless, at the first large snowfall, more than 1,500 UMass students marched on the Amherst College campus, and some number of those students were intent on malicious damage and destruction. Those students, who in a cowardly way hid in the crowd and engaged in malicious damage, are clearly guilty of criminal acts.

It is incumbent on the University and the College as well as town authorities, to do all that we can to stop this event from occurring again this year. We are attempting to educate our students about the dangers of this event, and we will plan other measures to deter students from participating. In the meantime, however, we urge all students to disabuse themselves of the notion that this event is just harmless fun, and we roundly condemn those students who have committed criminal acts.

University of Massachusetts-Amherst

Light refreshments at 3:30 p.m.

Dr. Clancey is a Senior Research Scientist at the Institute for Research on Learning. He received his Ph.D. from Stanford University, where he later became a Senior Research Associate. He has been active in expert systems research since he joined the MYCIN project in 1975 as co-developer of the antibiotic therapy and question-anwering programs. His research focusses on computational modeling of cognition and the design of architectures for expert systems to facilitate their construction, explanation, and multiple use.

Dr. Clancy is a member of the council of the American Association of Artificial Intelligence and an editor-in-chief of the AAAI Press. He has published several notable works and presented numerous tutorials on expert systems and educational applications.

ARTS & LIVING

Adam and Lucy have bad weeks on soaps

By BETH STOLLER
Collegian Correspondent

ALL MY CHILDREN — Adam saw the faces of his guests when they all removed their masks at the masquerade ball. Adam was furious when Palmer announced that he had taken over all of Adam's assets. After Tad cracked Adam's wall safe, he found proof that Adam had made a monetary contribution to Judge Goodman's election campaign. Dixie was awarded custody of Adam Jr. because of Adam's illegal involvement with Goodman. Angie diagnosed Adam as having high blood pressure (It's a small wonder considering the week he had). Eric told Erica that he thinks he will leave town soon. Barbara lied to Travis saying that a series of tests proved Tom is Samantha's father.

SOAP BUBBLES

GENERAL HOSPITAL — After Kate and Felicia unexpectedly nabbed Iona at Windermere, she agreed to help Robert implicate Jimmy in the counterfeit ring. Robert and Kate's relationship took a turn for the worse when Iona was thrown in jail for her crime. It was a sucky week all around for Lucy. Scotty told her that he and Tracy were going to destroy Alan financially. Lucy's car was stolen and her office was broken into. To top it all off, she is presently in a straight jacket, trapped in a grimy room, by Emil and Olivia. Anna and Sean set a trap for the "Diamond Lady," but she never showed up. The surgery is now complete and after the bandages are removed, Duke will probably be a new man (or a different actor). He can now return to the two people he has missed for so long, Anna and Robin.

DAYS OF OUR LIVES — Roman was surprised to learn that Yvette is a hooker. Yvette accepted Victor's marriage proposal. Rebecca and Shane got stuck in Salem when their car broke down. Shane insisted on staying there after he saw Alice and believed that he once knew her. Patch's car exploded as Patch and Marina walked toward it. Nick was rushed to the hospital in a coma after he collapsed. Justin and Angelica did the nasty.

Momix puts a kick back into performance art with innovation

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

On Friday, night Bowker auditorium was the scene of a very special event: the return of Momix, a modern dance troupe which incorporates vaudeville, comedy, mime gymnastics and illusion into its incomparably inventive program.

Although artistic director Moses Pendleton (who contributed choreography for Prince's "Batman" music video) did not dance because of a back injury, Cynthia Quinn, Beth Starosta and Joseph Mills enthralled the audience from beginning to end, with the indispensable support of Mitchell S. Levin's and Kevin Dreyer's lighting and production design.

Of the twelve diverse performances, there was not one weak or boring presentation. In "Elva," Mills dressed in a blue suit and blue shoes with a television for a head and a guitar in hand gyrating like Elvis to "Blue Suede Shoes." Beneath a diaphanous sheet outlining her bare body, Quinn streamed across the stage to a Stravinsky score, in "Gifts From The Sea," which concluded with the peal of church bells. "Brain Waving" featured a thick rope controlled by the troupe from offstage simulating an electroencephalogram (EEG). The rising and falling of the rope's arc and the stuttered frequency and velocity of the rope waves drew howls of laughter time and again.

In "Bird In My Dreams," Quinn once and for all dispelled any doubt about the inclusion of the dancer in the pantheon of athletics. Her body ripples and movement of isolated muscles were masterful. "Venus Envy" found Quinn and Starosta barebreasted in Michael Staats' clever sculpture of a pastel clamshell, slithering sensuously in, out and around the shell comically orchestrating their bodies to Henry Pucell's solemn music and the roar of the ocean. Dressed as a dandy in a white suit, red carnation and Panama hat, Mills used a cane for a vaulting prop in "Momix" to create the hilarious illusion he was moving in slow motion.

Draped in a silky white gown, Quinn danced "When We're Alone" cheek to cheek and mouth to mouth with her lover, a life-size mannequin in a white suit to Marianne Faithful's "Penthouse Serenade." Globular bubbles floated across the backdrop creating a ballroom atmosphere. While the song swooned to its conclusion, Quinn whirled her body dreamily and swung "her partner" over her head to a vociferous applause. Concluding the first portion of the show, Starosta and Mills wore skis in a piece entitled "Skiva." Dressed in black tights and performing against a black background, they slinked snake-like, topless, in synchronicity to a thumping African beat and the liquid flow of King Sunny Ade's guitar.

After a brief intermission, the tireless trio presented three more wondrous and thought-provoking pieces. Quinn and Starosta each used a big white balloon in "spawning" as a metaphor for life. Skimpily clad in g-strings, they hatched like newborns from their "eggs" to Peter Gabriel's sultry music. Using the balloons, they carried the weight of the world on their shoulders, held them in their mouths like pacifiers and placed them between their legs like horses, galloping away like children at play. From a seated position, they let the balloons float away as the song ended.

Circle Walker is a 1983 piece I have seen before, but some things one must see more than once to appreciated fully. Mills uses Alan Boeding's sculpture, two metal half circles crossed diagonally to form a gigantic gyroscope, to sit on, sit in, ride, roll on, hang sideways from and even climb atop, like a sailor on lookout at sea. He was able to contain the rolling sculpture as if by remote control. For instance, once he jumped off as the sculpture was moving away. As he was standing at the left front corner of the stage, it rolled obediently back to him. The stark black background and red lights created a Mars-like atmosphere, as if the sculpture were a planet.

Saving the best for last, the company presented "E.C.," relative of E.T. With the liberal use of light projectors and extra curtains, the dancers superimposed themselves to resemble two giants disrupting two people serenely meditating, whom they eventually kicked away. Then the giants became small and merged together into the shape of a mushroom. Later, they used their hands to create spiders climbing up and down the curtain. Then, in the realm of the fantastic, a body flew across the stage and another, gradually filling the curtain, seemed to almost jump into the audience, eliciting surprised squeals of approval.

As is customary, the dancers bowed together to acknowledge the rapturous praise and then returned separately to dance to the Talking Heads' "Burning Down The House." Although they didn't burn it down, they did bring it down.

Roches great, despite electronics

By J. TREVOR HUGHES
Collegian Correspondent

The Roches
John M. Greene Hall
Saturday, November 18

When faced with the high tech options available to musicians nowadays, many performers succumb to the ease and variety that synthesizers offer.

REVIEW

Something is always lost in this transition however, and The Roches proved it on Saturday night in John M. Greene Hall, at Smith College.

This singing-sister trio are well known for their soaring acapella harmonies. When they stuck to these roots in their performance the effect was nothing short of astounding. Such was the case with I Love My Mom; a simple and sincere message that brought smiles to many faces in the audience.

Unfortunately, The Roches' show was heavily ladened with drum synths and programmed melodies. On Greeting From Earth, the drum rhythm was so overpowering that it drowned out the subtle harmonies of the sisters.

The show really began to cook when the trio left their electronic crutches behind and stepped boldly into their best-known songs.

Terre Roche, in her classic dead-pan style, lightened the evening by telling an inspiring tale.

One night, Terre and a friend, in a fit of depression, cheered themselves up by talking . . . . about the faults of others. She highly recommended this form of therapy. Later, suffering from a "moral hangover," she wrote Everyone is Good, a song reaffirming her shaky faith in human nature.

This was followed by Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, which was done completely acapella. With each Hallelujah, The Roches sent complex harmonies cascading over the audience. This purist form of music without instruments was well received, resulting in thunderous applause and cheers from the crowd.

The Roches finally ended the evening after three encores, each spurred by a standing ovation.

In spite of the drum machine and heavy synthesizers, the show was a gem for folk affecionados of the area.

Hopefully, The Roches will soon realize that they shouldn't mess with a good thing.

Their niche in the music industry is secure, as long as they stick to their forte of vocal harmony that has worked so well in the past.

When they stray into the ugly world of pre-fab music, something very special is lost.

NRBQ is music lite

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

NRBQ
Katina's
Friday, Nov. 17

NRBQ is not a regional cuisine, a government agency or an isolated chromosome. NRBQ is an acronym for New Rhythm and Blues Quartet.

On Friday night at a packed and partisan Katina's, to the strains of the Beach Boys' "Two Girls for Every Boy", NRBQ crash-landed onto the stage like the Marx Brothers executing a fire drill. They set a torrid tone by opening with "Going To A Party" and "Wild Weekend", the title track of their first studio album in six years. A raucous rockabilly tune followed, ignited by guitarist Al Anderson's fiendish picking and jocular keyboardist Terry Adams' nursery rhyme introduction of his mates: "Here comes Joey, Here comes Al."

NRBQ specializes in paeans to fast cars, girls and comic novelty tunes, delivered in a frenzied blend of rock, rhythm and blues, rockabilly and even polka. For instance, on one call and response song Terry Admas shouted "Who loved Daddy-o" The band's answer: "Mommy-o!". They also fashioned twistee versions of "Tiger by the Tail" and "Whistle While You Work", and even one called "Girl Scout Cookies". "Let's Make Love (Not War)", a slow blues song, is about as serious or political as the band ventured.

Drummer Tom Ardolino came forward and introduced Tom, Jr., a small mannequin dressed and coiffed to resemble him and sang "Only You", with tongue firmly in cheek. NRBQ's humor greased the audience; in effect, the band and the crowd, feeding off each other, became one.

NRBQ is like a big sloppy wet kiss. They aren't pretty and they're not smooth, but as the band got looser, the music got tighter. The faithful chanted for an encore and the band responded generously by playing three more songs. An unfailing prescription for the blues, NRBQ is the quintessential party band.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

HAPPY BIRTHDAY! IN THE NEXT YEAR OF YOUR LIFE: Develop a more positive attitude and there is no limit to what you can accomplish! True committment is necessary to make a relationship rich and meaningful. Keeping secrets from your mate will harm the relationship if found out. A job will bring new personal rewards in February. Helping the elderly brings great personal satisfaction. You discover talents you did not know you possessed. Potential for travel looks promising in July. Recycle an old idea to earn a second income. Remain faithful to your ideals.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Make a departure from your usual round of activities. Define a domestic problem and seek family's cooperation in implementing changes. Sticking to your diet and exercise works miracles.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You profit from a chance encounter. An old friend provides the answer to a puzzle. If traveling by car, observe safety rules. Repair emotional fences; take responsibility for your actions.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Guard against letting impulse dominate logic. Strengths ties with loved ones. Do not take anyone or anything for granted. Making small, positive changes will promote domestic harmony.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Use morning hours to decide on new goals. If you gain the confidence of someone close to your heart, your chances of succeeding are assured. Comparison shopping helps you stick to your budget.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Family members will understand your priorities if you explain them. Do not waste time brooding over factors you cannot control. Improved nutrition will make you feel better. Look for a new cookbook.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Set new goals but avoid trying to rush things that need time to mature. A long-distance conference call will save time and money. A parent-child relationship benefits from a quiet exchange of ideas.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Travel, educational matters or distant developments could spring a surprise on you. Sort out your priorities. You will have to make adjustments to reap benefits from unexpected changes. Heed loved one.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Complete routine tasks early in the day. Pay bills on time. Pass on a social invitation if confused about someone's motives. You need to stay away from clandestine involvements. Attend to mate's needs.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A friend's proposition could separate you from your money. You are asking for trouble if you accept a ride on a flight of fantasy. Set a good example by showing common sense.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be on the lookout for important financial opportunities. A casual introduction could bring a new romantic attachment. Enrolling in night school or workshops could boost your earning potential.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be constructive when talking with your associates and you will move closer to your objectives. Be ready to capitalize on an influential person's advice. Good news from afar many affect your finances.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20): Travel will prove profitable if the news from a distance is positive. Feel free to express your enthusisam and ideas. Schedule meetings with authority figures. Do some cooking in advance for Thanksgiving

UMass hoop players take their game overseas

• Tate plays in Sweden

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts basketball team played the Sodertajle club from Sweden last weekend it was not as much a cultural experience for UMass forward John Tate as it was for the rest of his teammates.

Tate had played against some of these guys before. But it was on their home court in Visby, Sweden as part of the Atlantic 10 All-Star team in August. Most of them will be playing against each other in the next few months but in that 10-day tour of Sweden and Finland, the A-10 All stars were a team in a foriegn place where most of them had never been before.

"The guys that I played with are my friends for life," Tate said. "We just hit it off which made the trip that much better. I think everybody kind of left their egos at home and made it a nice trip for everybody else."

It was a very nice trip for the Atlantic 10 Conference. The all-stars went 6-0 against their Swedish, Finnish and Russian counterparts. Temple's Mark Macon and West Virginia's Steve Berger led the stars past guys by the name of Torbjorn Gerkhe and Pekka Markkanen who play a totally different style of basketball in their part of the globe.

"They play up and down like [Sodertajle]," Tate said. "You have to get back or they'll score 100,000 on you if you don't run up and down the floor. Everybody can shoot."

When players like Tom Savage from Rutgers (10.8 points a game on the trip) and Chris Brooks (13.8) start throwing their weight around, the shooting tends to get rattled a bit. "We were a little too physical for them," Tate said.

The style of play is not the only difference between America and Sweden though. The language of course differs but English is the second language for most Swedes. However, the cuisine and cabs are not what the average American is used to.

"The food was different. It had a different taste," Tate said. "It didn't seem cooked to us. It seemed almost raw. I think we were all tripped out on how the cabs were Mercedes and Rolls Royce and Saabs."

The team did not have much time for sightseeing, having a basketball game every day. But one site it did get to lay eyes upon was Olympic Stadium in Finland where the 1928 Olympics were held.

"It was nice to see how small the Olympic facilities were," Tate said. "Basketball back then (1928) wasn't much of an Olympic game as it is now. The fans were really into it in Helsinki. They were just as rowdy as any American fans."

But the fans did not like their visitors too much after the A-10 All-Stars rallied past the Finnish National team, 89-76. Three days later, the A-10 played Estonia (USSR) in Helsinki and the boos that the A-10 had heard before turned into cheers.

"Everybody wanted the Russians to lose," Tate said.

And they did lose, 86-80, as George Washington University's center, Clint Holtz, scored 15 points to lead the stars to their second win in the Pohjola Tournament. The A-10 went on to win the tournament by beating the Finnish national team again, 89-85.

Tate did not get to play much, scoring 1.5 points a game and 2.5 rebounds but he believes that the trip made him a better basketball player.

"When you have guys like Mark Macon, Tom Savage and Steve Berger, you don't have to do much," Tate said. "You just sit back and watch. I watched what Mark Macon does. Even in the summertime when most guys are thinking "Oh it's only the summer", he has the same intensity which he does in the Atlantic 10.

"I've learned what it takes to get to that next level where the Mark Macons and the Tom Savages are," Tate said. "You just appreciate what they do."

The cultural differences were not the only difference for Tate in Sweden. After playing center for most of last year in a UMass uniform, the 6-foot-7 Tate went to the forward position while he was in Sweden and Finland.

"I played forward which was new for me," Tate said. "I wasn't really comfortable until the end of the trip."

Last weekend when the Minutemen played Sodertajle at the Curry Hicks Cage, Tate seemed to feel pretty comfortable though. He scored 17 points and pulled down nine boards in an 89-88 loss to the Swedes. Tate tipped the ball in the basket about one second after the buzzer sounded in that game.

Tate apparently had learned a lot from his summer vacation.

• Herer plays in Israel

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Israel is not the most attractive place to be visiting these days. Not with the soldiers carrying guns around the street and the conflict with the Palestinians. A basketball game would seem to be the last thing anyone wanted in that country right now.

Over this past summer though, the Maccabiah games were held in Israel where a player with Jewish descent would play in an Olympic type of festival. UMass guard Cary Herer was selected to play for the United States team.

"Everywhere, you see rifles and soldiers walking around," Herer said in the friendly confines of Curry Hicks Cage. "It's pretty scary if you're not used to something like that. You see people getting killed on the news every day."

In Maccabiah news, the U.S. won the silver medal in basketball with Herer contributing 20 minutes a game. But bad news gripped the athletes at the games as well.

"When we were there one of the Arabs or someone tipped over a bus and 20 people died and there were two athletes that were in the games that died."

The airport security in Israel was not as tight as in the U.S. Herer said. Extreme caution was taken before the athletes took off for the long flight to Israel.

"We had like a million questions before we got on the plane," Herer said. "They wouldn't tell us what time the plane was leaving for security reasons."

It was the first time that the Fairfield, Conn. native had been to Israel. The senior guard played in 17 games for the Minutemen last year and thinks that his experience in Israel has greatly improved his game.

"I think I improved 100 percent," Herer said.

Herer must be glad to be back in Amherst but all was not bad in Israel, despite the 100-degree weather every day during the summer.

"It was a good experience, getting together with a lot of different people," Herer said.

But the games also were designed to help Jewish people learn a little bit about its people's homeland as the athletes toured the country for the first week before the games started.

"We went to Masadah, we went to museums," Herer said. "The whole U.S. team, all the sports, stayed together for the first week. It was basically a cultural experience, getting to know all the other athletes from the United States. It was really strange how we got to know each other so well, after only being over there for three weeks. They'll be my lasting friends forever."

■ football beats New Hampshire, 34-28

The turnabout wouldn't be that dramatic, but it was a fair one in its own right. After the Spittel score, it took just five plays for UMass to get one back. Blauvelt had a 19-yard run, followed by 18 from Wilkos to bring it inside the UNH 20. After a sack, Wilkos nailed split end Lamar Newsome from 17 yards for the score. The point-after attempt hit the goal post and it stood at 28-19.

Little did New Hampshire know that the UMass defense would bend a few more times, but would never again break. Three plays and out gave UMass the ball back. After an offensive pass interference call, Wilkos aired it out to split end Chip Mitchell, who eluded two defenders and caught Wilkos' dart in stride for a 72-yard score. Rick Probstein's PAT brought UM to within 28-26.

After another UNH punt, Wilkos booted for 18 yards and picked up another 15 on a late hit penalty, which ended the third quarter with the ball resting on the Wildcat 15. On the next play, Blauvelt took the handoff and broke for the outside right corner, but saw nothing but a wall of white jerseys. Reversing his field, Blauvelt outlegged the defense to the left side of the end zone for the winning score, and Wilkos hit Mike Tobin for the key two-point conversion.

"I just wanted to make something happen," Blauvelt said. "I made something out of nothing."

Wilkos completed 9 of 16 passes for 209 yards and two touchdowns and also led all rushers with 71 yards. For his work, he was given the Bill Knight Award as game most valuable player (see related story).

UMass wouldn't threaten again, but UNH couldn't capitalize on any more chances. Keyed by three sacks by Mario Perry and a clinching interception by Bobby Burke in the last minute, the Minutemen stood their ground.

But not without a little help. Chris Braune dropped a first-down pass on the UMass 20, and Carr overthrew a wide-open Matt Banbury in the end zone. (How wide-open? He could have run to Sunderland before anyone caught him, and that would have been by bus.)

"I didn't see it. I was talking to somebody," Reid said of the overthrow play. "But I'm glad I didn't."

"We didn't connect on the big plays," Bowes said. "We had a couple in the first half, but in a game like that, with two teams going at each other, those plays were not enough."

After Wilkos had given UMass a 7-0 lead with an 8-yard run 4:10 into the game, Carr struck on a 75-yarder to John Perry to tie it at 7-all 3:23 into the second. On the next drive, Wilkos found Tobin on the fly for a 73-yarder to the UNH 2, which set up Steve Olson's 2-yard dive to make it 13-7.

But two more Carr TD strikes, one each to Barry Bourassa (six yards) and Braune (26) gave the 'Cats a 21-13 edge at the break. Braune's TD came with just 20 ticks left in the half after punter Dwyane Gordon pinned the Minutemen deep and UMass was forced to punt.

(522 yards), throwing for eight touchdowns and rushing for six more.

Wilkos is the fourth quarterback to be presented the Bill Knight Trophy in as many years. UMass quarterback Tim Bryant won the inaugural trophy in 1986, while New Hampshire's Bob Jean took it in '87.

Last year, it was a memorable performance by UMass quarterback Dave Palazzi, who had over 400 yards in total offense in leading the Minutemen to a stunning 64-42 win on the last day of the season, clinching a tie for the Yankee Conference title and a berth in the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

Minutemen finish '89 season with a bang

UMass wins, 34-28, to end UNH hopes of playoff bid

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Suffice to say there are some pretty unhappy campers in the Granite State today.

When the pairings for the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs were announced yesterday, the University of New Hampshire wasn't among the 16 teams selected. Which isn't surprising, given the fact that the Wildcats were shot down by the University of Massachusetts, 34-28 Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

But it goes deeper than that. Four times in this decade, New Hampshire has controlled its own playoff destiny, and the formula each time was simple. Make a trek to Amherst, beat the Minutemen and ride off into the sunset.

Four times now, the 'Cats have come up on the short end.

"What can I say, they did it to us again," said a disappointed UNH coach Bill Bowes.

So while, once again, the season concluded on a bummer note for UNH, it was a sweet ending for the Minutemen, one that allowed them to pull the season out of the fire and finish up with a bang at the .500 mark (5-5-1).

"This was the biggest win all year," said junior flanker/tailback Ron Blauvelt, whose 15-yard run on the first play of the fourth quarter provided the winning margin for UMass. "It not only puts us at .500, but it spoils someone else's season. Enough teams have spoiled ours."

It took a tremendous comeback in which the Minutemen scored three touchdowns in a span of 3:45 to erase a 28-13 UNH lead.

"Our guys came back, and dug deep, just like New Hampshire came back after they were 0-2 and won seven in a row," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "There were two great character football teams out there today."

The Wildcats (7-3 overall, 5-3 in the Yankee Conference), were controlling the game, having scored three consecutive touchdowns of their own to reverse an early UMass advantage.

"I looked at my list at halftime and there were seven reasons why we were going to lose this game," Reid said. "I just asked them to go out and don't leave the memories of missed extra points, fumbles and penalties. Go out and play hard-nosed, tough football. I don't even care about winning, but just do those things."

It would take a while for things to kick in. UMass trailed 21-13 at the break, and things didn't get better fast. Taking over on a fumble at the UMass 16, the 'Cats went right to work. Senior quarterback Mark Carr, who completed 27 of 46 passes for 355 yards and four TDs, hit split end Rob Spittel from eight yards out with 5:23 left in the third quarter, and UNH looked in command.

But behind redshirt freshman quarterback Gary Wilkos, UMass went on a tirade that had people thinking back to last year's contest in Durham, NH when UMass scored 33 third-quarter points to erase a New Hampshire lead, en route to a 64-42 slugfest win.

Wilkos wins Bill Knight Trophy

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Gary Wilkos stood at the front of the interview room, having just led his University of Massachusetts teammates to a 34-28 upset of the University of New Hampshire Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

His left (non-thowing) wrist was in a plaster cast, the result of a broken navicular bone. Despite that, he was able to complete 9 of 16 passes for 209 yards and two touchdowns, as well as carry the ball 22 times for a game-high 71 yards and another score.

For his achievements, Wilkos was named the fourth winner of the Bill Knight Award, which according to the inscription on the trophy is "Presented Annually to the Most Valuable Player of the Massachusetts-New Hampshire game. In Memory of Bill Knight, longtime Sports Information Director at the University of New Hampshire and Publicity Director of the Yankee Conference. A Dedicated, Loyal and Caring Person."

"I will never present this without saying that Bill Knight represented everything that is great about college athletics," UMass coach Jim Reid said. "He was respected by everyone he worked with and worked for.

"So Gary knows to not accept the trophy for only his football accomplishment, but for the integrity and devotion. That's what [Knight] stood for, and that's what this trophy stands for."

"I just wanted to play today for the seniors," Wilkos said, downplaying the honor a little. "And to start off fresh for 1990."

Winning the trophy caps off a long climb from bottom to top for Wilkos, who also was named Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Week and is a top candidate for yearly rookie honors.

The redshirt freshman from Staten Island, N.Y. started spring drills fifth on the depth chart, and didn't make much of a statement during spring camp.

"I tried not to place myself on the depth chart," Wilkos said. "I just tried to work hard in practice."

After a summer of hard work, Wilkos jumped to No. 2 in preseason and took over the starting job in Week 5.

Despite various bumps and bruises that have knocked him out of games, Wilkos finished the year as the team's leading passer (1,171 yards) and second-leading rusher

Men's swimming gets back at Boston College

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

Last season, the Boston College Eagles ended the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team's 41-meet unbeaten streak. But like the saying goes, payback is a bitch. Friday night, the Minutemen crushed the Eagles rather easily, 158-85, taking nine of the 13 events.

"We swam really well out there," said head coach Russ Yarworth. "I was really pleased with our performance."

It was a complete team effort, as everybody got into the action. The Minutemen were led by Brian McIver and Jay Peluso. McIver won the 50- and the 100-yard freestyle, while Peluso won both the 200-yard breaststroke and the 200-yard individual medley. Both also played key roles in the relay events. Peluso was a member of the 400 medley relay which won with a 3.38.53 time. McIver helped bring a win in the 400 freestyle relay

The Minutemen were quite successful in several other events. They took first and second in the 200-yard butterfly. Tim Turpin won in with a time of 2.02.02. Roger Kennedy finished in second. UMass also won the 200-yard backstroke, as well as taking second and third in the 1000-yard freestyle.

"Motivating the team wasn't too difficult," said Yarworth. "After what happened last year, we really wanted to put them in their place."

Boston College only added fuel to the fire by releasing a program with a front cover that didn't sit too well with the Minutemen. The cover consisted of a large eagle throwing a pie at a minuteman. Underneath, in large letters were the words 'humble pie.'

"I really didn't have to say much to the team," said Yarworth. "I just showed them the cover, and they knew what had to be done. I thought the cover was obnoxious and done in poor taste."

Women's swimming stuck in the water at Maine

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Correspondent

Let's keep things in perspective, the women's swimming team is training for the New England Championships. Saturday afternoon at the University of Maine, the Black Bears shamed UMass 191-107.

"We were really flat," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb. "Maybe it was the bus ride, maybe it was because we were emotionally too high." For whatever reason, UMass swam very poorly and as a result of their inability to match Maine's performance, the Minutewomen are now 2-2.

Freshman Sarah McGorry was one of the few bright spots for UMass, "Sarah swam really well," Newcomb said. McGorry who swam the 100-meter and 200-meter breast stroke has earned high praise from her coach. But praise does not win races, and McGorry must sustain her race performance against Springfield College in two weeks.

The least surprising result of the race was that Michele Leary won her three races and remains undefeated this year. "I would like to play down Michele's performance for a while and focus on the rest of the team," said Newcomb.

"The Thanksgiving break may be good mentally, but physically this break hurts us," Newcomb said. "We have a tough young Springfield squad, that always gives us fits." Right now there is no team that is easy for UMass because they are struggling as a team. It seems as if Newcomb has yet to unleash his swimmers, but Newcomb points out, "This is a hard time of the season for us, we've never swam well at this time of year." Right now UMass needs a confidence builder, and the only way they can get this is by defeating Springfield. "We need to reinforce to our swimmers that they will swim fast at the New Englands," Newcomb said. "It's hard for the freshmen to believe that they will swim fast, but the upperclassmen know that they will get there."

Newcomb was very surprised at how well Maine swam. "Maine swam so much better than they did last year," he said.

Women's soccer players get New England honors

Three members of the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team were selected to the New England Women Intercollegiate Soccer Association's 1989 All New England Regional Team.

Juniors April Kater (11 goals, 9 assists, 31 points) and Sue Gaudette (9-11-29) were selected onto the first team, and freshman defender Holly Hellmuth made the second team.

Minsky: Fees influence college curricula

By PAUL MORRIS
Collegian Staff

American corporations are paying off high ranking university administrators across the United States who in turn allow risky research and development projects to be financed by taxpayers and students, a spokesman for a Washington-based public interest group said last night.

"Almost all university presidents sit on one or more corporate boards," said Leonord Minsky, executive secretary of the National Coalition for Universities in the Public Interest. "Their interests are the interest of the board they sit on. Very often corporations have research agreements with university administrators they are paying off," Minsky said.

Minsky said that in the 1970s American corporations realized that their technological innovation was lagging behind the rest of the world. Because big business is concerned with impressing stockholders with big profit margins, corporations limit research and development funds, he said.

"Rather than reinvesting in the corporation and doing research in private, which is what the Japanese do, they began to take over research in American universities," he said.

No college receives more than 15 percent of its operating budget from corporations, but he found many administrators were more loyal to the corporations than to the students or to the taxpayers, he said.

In 1980 a federal patent act was changed to allow universities to issue exclusive patent licenses when they discovered new technology, he said. "If you own the patent you have exclusive rights and enjoy a huge profit margin," he said.

Corporation research is done at universities because they do not have to pay for the full costs of research, he said. In return for the research, corporations give the universities grants, appoint college presidents to the board of directors, and give academic deans stocks so they have a vested interest in the company. The funds given to the universities are written off on the corporation's taxes, he said.

University administrators are now recruiting professors who do lucrative corporate research, and downsizing academic programs that are not profitable. In most cases this means higher salaries for science and engineering, he said. Since the early 1980s corporations have had an increasingly louder voice in what is researched and studied at American universities, he said.

"The purpose of the university is to train people to have critical minds and be independent thinkers," Minsky said. "If the university doesn't do that, nobody will."

"Start paying attention to what is going on here and you'll find out all sorts of interesting things," he said.

Rape case continued

Matthew P. LeBlanc, 22, of Fairhaven, was released on his own personal recognizance Thurdsay afternoon following arrest on the University of Massachusetts campus on a charge of rape. LeBlanc, who resides locally at 1039 N. Pleasant St., Amherst, has been instructed to stay away from the victim. The case, brought against LeBlanc by the Commonwealth, is continued until Dec. 7 when a pre-trial conference is scheduled.

Phone drive helps

The Newman Center phone drive, which ended last Friday, swayed legislators' decisions about the budget cuts, said Steve Kulik, of Relations and Development at the University of Massachusetts.

"I think the students deserve a pat on the back and a lot of congratulations," Kulik said.

"I know [the calls] had a direct impact on how they voted on the 03 accounts," he said.

CIA analyst: US involved in foreign election

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

United States officials have been playing a key role in discrediting Nicaraguan elections in an effort to keep control of the country through the Contras, former CIA Analyst David MacMichael said last night.

Speaking at the Student Union Ballroom, MacMichael said due to the "pathological obsession" of Ronald Reagan with Nicaragua, the United States government has been pouring millions of dollars into controlling Nicaragua and fabricating lies in an effort to gain support for the Contras.

The Reagan administration's need to control Nicaragau grew out of traditional American policies in dealing with Central America, MacMichael said. "Administrators were determined to overcome the 'Vietnam Syndrome,'" MacMichael said. "The US wanted to get back into the Third World with an easy victory," he said.

In addition to funding the Contras, MacMichael said another way the United States stayed involved in Nicaragua was through elections. He said the CIA paid a candidate $6,000 a month to run in the 1984 Nicaraguan election in order to say conditions were unfair and to discredit the election.

He said US officials also attempted to bribe other candidates in the election and then claimed the elections were not valid, although other officials said the election was fairly run.

MacMichael said Nicaragua has come up with a plan to end support of irregular forces in Central America by holding elections under a constitutional government, but said the United States rejects the idea and continues to give more aid to the Contras.

He said the only debate over funding of the Contras in Congress is the method.

"They [the Nicaraguan government] don't have a friend in either house, with a few rare and noble exceptions," MacMichael said.

Edgar Chamorro, former director of the Contras and author of the book "Packaging The Contras: A Case of CIA Disinformation" also said "there are a lot of lies and deception going on."

Chamorro, who said he saw first hand the tactics of the US government, said it is important for Americans to follow the money that Congress is sending to Central America.

He said the US government has allocated about $200 per Contra for humanitarian aid alone, and a total of $6000 per Contra over the past nine months.

He said most of the US money sent to Nicaragua is ending up in the wrong hands and the money is only corrupting the area due to the extremely difficult economic situation in the country.

He said the upcoming February elections in Nicaragua could resemble elections held in the Phillipines.

"My fear is that this could be tragic, there could be a lot of blood shed," he said.

Grant funds Near Eastern Studies center

By JOHN PATRICK MUSULIN
Collegian Staff

The Five Colleges, Inc. has received a grant of $628,000 from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation to establish an undergraduate center for Near Eastern Studies during the next five years, officials said.

Murray Schwartz, dean of the faculty of Humanities and Fine Arts at the University of Massachusetts, said the idea for the center emerged during a discussion with the Mellon Foundation last spring.

"[The foundation] usually supports graduate programs," he said. "This is unusual for them."

Schwartz will serve as the UMass representative on a five-college committee which will oversee the center's operations during the next five years.

According to the grant proposal, the main goal of the center would be to help meet a national need for Near East specialists "by accelerating the movement of young scholars into graduate study."

Lorna Peterson, associate coordinator for Planning and Development at Five Colleges, Inc., said, "The desire to increase instruction in Near Eastern languages has been around for several years. It was clear that a strong language background was needed to support serious and expanded studies on the Near East."

The grant proposal says, "Undergraduates are generally unable to complete a course of [Near Eastern Studies] that prepares them for graduate level [work]. They acquire neither the mastery of the language nor the understanding of the region to undertake scholarly work."

The center's five year plan includes support for 20 undergraduates from the five colleges for summer study in a Near Eastern country, in order to supplement their course work in language and regional studies.

Four years of instruction in Hebrew and Arabic have been available for several years through the cooperative efforts of the five colleges. Funds from the Mellon grant will improve the availability of these language courses at all the campuses through a second full-time joint appointment in Arabic and a half-time appointment in Hebrew.

The Center for Near Eastern Studies will seek to organize the various courses and resources available at the five schools into a consolidated, comprehensive course of study.

Yale professor discusses the science of politics

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

In Memorial Hall last night, Yale University mathematics professor Serge Lang addressed approximately 150 people on the science of politics.

"There is a political streak in me besides mathematics," Lang said. He said he investigates the role of politics and the role of media on education and understands education and the role of universities.

The politics Lang discussed dealt with a study published in 1966 by S.P. Huntington that termed Belgium, France, and the Union of South Africa as "satisfied" nations and gauged their frustration ratios in terms of GNP and caloric intake among other things.

Huntington, a professor of political science at Harvard University is director of the Center for International Studies there. He has served as a consultant to the State Department, Defense Department and the National Security Council.

Huntington was nominated to the National Academy of Sciences in 1987 but was rejected.

"It was this nomination that triggered me to look into this case," Lang said. "What concerned me was the eminence of Huntington and the position he occupies. It was significant that I should find a certain amount of defectiveness in his survey," he said..

"There was a creation of mis-information and spread of mis-information," he said. It was disturbing to him that there should be a perpetuation of wrong information in university settings, where this material was circulated.

The survey contained a statement that read, "the term satisfied has to do with whether...people are satisfied with their lot. When this study... was done in the early 1960s, there had been no major riots, strikes, or disturbances [in South Africa]."

Lang said the term "satisfied" was a completely subjective term and he objected to the manner in which the survey represented Huntington's personal frame of mind.

Lang's documentation consists of a 50 page collection of articles that describe insurrections of Blacks in South Africa of May 1951. These uprisings are not cited in Huntington's "factual survey." The documentation also contains a 14-page essay dealing with several false statements on the part of Huntington.

Lang approached Discover Magazine, Footnotes (a publication of the American Sociological Association) and elsewhere with his documentation in an attempt to have it published. He was rejected by these without justification.

"It has been said that I am carrying out a personal vendetta. My documentation deals with nothing about their personal lives. Their personal life is off-limits," Lang said.

"To the extent that they seek power it is legitimate to hold them accountable" for their statements, Lang said.

Service recognizes hardships of Ethiopian Jews

By APRIL MARIE ROGOWSKI
Collegian Correspondent

Twenty people dedicated their weekly Sabbath last Friday to the deliverance of Ethiopian Jews to Israel, said Rhonda Cohen of Hillel.

"The Friday Mass was part of a movement to increase public awareness of the distress these Jews are tolerating in Ethiopia," she said.

The current Marxist military regime, led by Lt. Mingiustu, persecutes Black Ethiopian Jews, who constitute one percent of Ethiopia's population, by forbidding them to own land and restricting them from emigrating to Israel, Cohen said.

However, Ethiopian Jews have renewed hope that they will be allowed to emigrate, because of a recent statement by Mingiustu that "Ethiopia has established ties with Israel," she said.

Cohen said that thousands of women, children, and elderly Ethiopian Jews remain stranded in the impoverished nation, after a 1984 secret mission to remove Jews to Israel.

"Operation Rescue," an attempt to airlift refugees from Ethiopia to Jerusalem, enabled 16,000 Ethiopian Jews to escape, she said.

The media uncovered the project and as a result, the government increased restrictions on emigration to Israel, she said.

The mass also commemorated Mickey Leland, a politician who attempted to aid the suffering Jews in their flight to Israel, Cohen said.

Leland, chairperson of the Congressional Black Congress, attempted to raise consciousness and money to help the Ethiopian Jews, by visiting their villages, and reporting on their status to the United States, she said.

He died in July of 1989 after his plane crashed returning from one of his visits to an Ethiopian Jewish village.

The Sabbath, led by Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, was sponsored by Hillel.

Hillel is "dedicated to provide for the basic needs of the Jewish community , to strive to enhance appreciation and understanding of Jewish values, and to maintain relations with other organizations on this campus', according to Cohen.

Jill Orenstein, one of the participants in the mass, said "It heightens your awareness of Jews in other areas."

After participating in the service, many people discussed committing themselves to the purpose of increasing peoples' consciousness about Ethiopian Jews.

Hillel has scheduled an exhibition on Ethiopian Jewry for March, and is also currently planning to distribute bracelets to honor their dedication to Ethiopian Jews.

A Grayson Residence Hall man was taken by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital Friday after a portion of his thumb was amputated when a door was accidentally slammed on his hand, police said.

In other police reports:

ACCIDENTS

- A man reported his vehicle was hit on the passenger side while it was parked in Lot 41A Friday.
- A vehicle leaving Warren G. McGuirk Alumni Stadium Friday was hit from behind after stopping quickly to avoid pedestrians. Damage was estimated at $1300.
- A woman reported Saturday her vehicle parked in Lot 64 was hit on the right side. Damage was estimated at more than $100.

ARRESTS

- Edgar Duran, 21, of 47 Amity St., was arrested Saturday in Lot 43 on charges of operating after his license was suspended.
- Police arrested Gary J. Beaulieu, 19, of Chicopee, Saturday at the intersection of Fearing St. and Sunset Ave. on charges of being a minor transporting alcohol, speeding and a stop sign violation.
- A John F. Kennedy Hall man, Charles S. Williamson, 19, was arrested Saturday on charges of being a minor in possession of alcohol.
- Elaine Gale, 20, of Northampton, was arrested Saturday on Massachusetts Ave. on charges of possession of an altered license.
- Joseph V. Borelli, 21, of Cambridge, was arrested Saturday for operating without a license at the corner North Pleasant St. and Fearing St.

VANDALISM

- A woman reported Thursday the mirror and directional light on her car parked in Lot 49 were broken and there were muddy footprints across the hood.
- Police discovered Thursday the wooden barricade arm at the entrance to the Campus Center had broken off. The loss was estimated at $100.

LARCENY

- A man reported his jacket was stolen from Boyden Gym Friday. The loss was estimated at $89.
- A Lewis Residence Hall man reported his Sony Walkman was stolen from his room Thursday. The loss was estimated at $55.

'Big Bang' theory challenged

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Staff

The discovery of a quasar, or quasi stellar object, challenges the validity of the "Big Bang" theory of the formation of the universe, said Thomas Arny, professor of astronomy at the University of Massachusetts.

"The argument is that [the discovery of the quasar] may pose a problem as to when the Big Bang occurred," Arny said.

The quasar was estimated to have originated about one billion years after the Big Bang, Arny said. It was previously estimated that the age of most quasars occurred about three billion years after the Big Bang, he said.

This recent quasar discovery does not allow enough time between the Big Bang and the formation of the stars and galaxies,

Arny said. The estimated time of the Big Bang or the estimated age of the quasar could be incorrect, he said.

The discovery, announced Sunday, was made by Dr. Donald Schneider of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, N.J., Dr. Maarten Schmidt of the California Institute of Technology and Dr. James Gunn of Princeton University.

Arny compared the discovery of this quasar to the discovery that your roommate's mother is twelve years old.

"Either your roommate is younger or her mother is older than you thought," Arny said.

The Big Bang was estimated to have occured about 15 billion years ago, Arny said. The Big Bang concept explains the formation of the universe as once being a hot and dense mass that was dispersed by an explosion, he said.

"Because the galaxies are now flying apart they must have at one time been together," Arny said.

Arny said that the age of the quasar is estimated by the shift in wavelengths of light. The light from the quasar is measured by the way it is dispersed.

On-campus dance club closed

"Murray D's," an on-campus dance club that has been in operation since March of this year, is no longer open due to lack of student interest.

Sponsored by the Board of Governors and Food Services, Murray D's has been operating in the TOC restaurant on Friday nights for the past two semesters.

Although interest in the club was high initially, it tapered off quickly, said Jeff Glassman, program coordinator for the BOG program council.

"At first we averaged about 150-180 people a night, but towards the end of the semester the crowd tapered off," he said.

According to Glassman, interest continued to decline this semester, with an average of only 20-25 students a night.

"We were trying to offer something unique to the students," Glassman said. "Muray D's had good food, a good DJ, no lines at the door and it wasn't the usual 'let's get drunk' atmosphere, but people just didn't respond."

Glassman added that the BOG has plans pending for a new all-ages dance club in the Bluewall next semester on every other Friday night.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

"HE WAS A REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE, BUT HE ONLY MADE IT THROUGH THE FIRST TRIMESTER!"

Don't be ignorant of ethnicity

Of the few editorials I have written, I have expressed outrage against various types of oppression. However, I would like to look at this subject from a different aspect. Ignoring the offensive name calling and acts of violence, some instances of insensitivity can be seen in a humorous light.

Adam Stein

I remember telling one woman in my neighborhood that I would not be able to shovel her snow on Sunday — I had to go to religious school. No, not at St. Agnes, but at Temple Beth El. The brick had fallen and she said, "Oh, so you're Jewish." Bingo! Now where's those contestant prizes?

Then she said, "Well, that's all right." Thank goodness for Chef Boy-R-Dee because for awhile I wasn't sure. Say, is it "all right" for my sister, mother and father to be Jewish too?

On another occasion a woman also figured out I was Jewish and said, "We have the Berkowitz's living down the street." Gee, I didn't know that. Say, should I tell her that my neighbor is also grey haired and has a double chin too?

She went on to tell me that, "They're very nice people." Well that's enough for me. Not only are they Jewish but nice too. When can I meet them?

Another person responded to my Jewishness by saying that, "Some of my best friends are Jewish." Really? What a coincidence, some of my favorite relatives are Jewish too.

I can't recall any examples of this type of ignorance until this year. This semester I have experienced too many to count now that I have been wearing my Yamulke (Yah-mu-kah), called kipa (kee-pah) in Hebrew, or skullcap (skul-cap) in English. There is less than ten of us on campus, but don't assume we all wrote this editorial.

Someone once quoted a phrase of Hebrew and asked me what it meant. I don't have a problem with this because a person keeping more of the Jewish traditions would be more likely than others to educate themselves about their people's language. I didn't know and they exclaimed, "But you're wearing a kipa!"

That's right, I am. And you're wearing a Harvard Crew sweatshirt. Do you know the name of the captain or what time they have practice?

Here's a good one. I've been Jewish all my life. I've also been a student senator for two years. By simple reasoning, one could figure that I've been a Jewish senator for the same amount of time. Though we are few, I am not the only Jewish person in the SGA. There, I have never been asked any questions about Jewish-things until I wore my kipa.

One might claim that perhaps people didn't know my nationality (I chose this word deliberately) until I wore my kipa. But then again, "Adam Stein" is called in roll call three or four times a meeting. Do I have to tell you that Catie O'Sullivan is Irish?

Okay, I'll continue. The Senate needs to know the date of a certain Jewish holiday. It is coming in a couple of weeks and I, like them, have not looked at my schedule that far in advance. The person with the microphone asks me the date. One hundred heads turn waiting for my response. Now that I have been wearing a kipa, "What am I? A scholar?"

I took my UMass academic planner out of my bag. You know, the one we all bought at the textbook annex while waiting in the cashier's line. I turned through two weeks of pages and found the date of the holiday. Do you think anyone could have done that?

Sadly, I have many more stories such as these. Like other people who do not fit into the cultural norm, I ask you to stop and think about what you are going to say to me before you say it. Are you making any sort of assumptions? Do you have any preconceived notions? If you do, turn the statement towards yourself, finding some similar situation relating to your own ethnicity.

After you do this, only then can you talk to me without sounding ignorant.

Sex, lies and turkey dinner

Many of us will be fortunate enough to go home this Thursday, to enjoy a festive, delicious Thanksgiving dinner — as will most of middle America.

And, most likely, the same old traditions will be observed:

Meredith O'Brien

There will be the annual football game at the old high school. Relatives who you haven't seen since last year, will visit and question you about school, future plans. And an abundant turkey dinner with all of the dressings will be made by good old mom (grandma or aunt) for your family to gorge on. Afterwards, more of the same — football games on t.v. for the men, while mom, grandma, aunts and sisters clean up and prepare a huge spread of pies, cakes and other goodies for dessert.

Does this sound like what happens at your Thanksgiving dinner? I would venture to guess that this describes a majority of middle-American Thanksgivings. It certainly describes mine.

But what's wrong with this picture of Americana? There is a noticeable difference in the sex roles that are played out, not just on Thanksgiving, but on all holidays where families and friends get together for big meals.

The image of mom or grandma cooking in the kitchen was the prevalent image of the 40s and 50s. Now, supposedly, women are liberated from the oppressive roles of homemaker. Men are supposed to be able to feel comfortable stepping into the kitchen to cook and clean dishes.

This women's lib concept, spawned in the 60s, by those newly liberated women, is just a sham. When it comes right down to it, women are still portrayed — not just by men, but by themselves — as the cooks, dishwashers, servants and gracious hostesses.

Even when throwing a large gathering (I'm not including catered gatherings, or ones taken care of by servants), women are the ones who are complimented for the delicious meal, for the spotless home. Why? Because it is simply assumed that the women did the all of the preparations.

Not only does this make men feel like they are, or should be, inept in the kitchen, it emasculates them if they assume such traditionally "female" roles.

Keeping in mind that the grandparents, aunts and uncles who attend these gatherings are from a different generation — where it was the role of the woman to stay in the kitchen, take care of the home and kids — why are people who have grown up in the 60s era, still clinging to the old ideals?

My mother, whose age shall not be revealed due to threat of death, is a product of the 60s "revolution." She has always believed that the cooking and upkeep of the house is not explicitly the role of the wife, daughter, or any other female in the house.

In fact, my father does most of the cooking and cleaning. But on Thanksgiving, it is my mother who cooks. Why? Because she believes that the dinner is her responsibility (and because she's afraid my father will screw up the entire thing). All of my relatives come to my house, heaping praise all over my mother, while the females aid her, and the male members of the family sit back, watch t.v. and sleep.

I keep saying to her that if and when a Thanksgiving dinner occurs in my home, both male and female members of my family will help. My husband won't sit in front of the tube and burp after stuffing himself. Or if he does, the work and preparation for the dinner will have been a joint venture.

My mother believes that my concept of an equal Thanksgiving dinner won't happen. I say she is wrong. Even if there are still some generations caught in the web of stereotyped sex roles, (hopefully) members of my generation will disavow those roles.

This past weekend my boyfriend and his male roommates made me dinner, and we helped them clean the dishes.

That's the way it should be.

Apologetic senator seeks to clarify

An open letter to the ALANA community,

During a presentation I made in front of the Graduate Student Senate last week on behalf of the striking undergraduate student body, I inadvertently strung two separate points together that some people perceived to be related. For this I would like to make a formal public apology.

During my presentation I was asked by the senate to assess how the strike was going. In an attempt to paint an accurate assessment of positives and negatives I choose to give an example of each.

As a positive, I mentioned that members of the ALANA community at UMass had joined the existing leadership of the Union of Undergraduates and had formed a unified Steering Committee.

As a negative point I chose to mention that two days after the strike had begun the movement had lost a little bit of steam as attendance on picket lines and teach-ins had decreased.

Unfortunately, due to a less than brilliant formation of words on my part, some people perceived that I stated that the strike movement had lost steam because the ALANA students had joined the effort.

This could not have been farther from the truth. The two statements were meant to be totally independent of each other.

I would like to apologize to anyone who misinterpreted my statements and was offended by them. No malice of any kind was intended. I used poor judgement in stringing together two separate points during an impromptu speech that had no relation to each other.

I publicly admit my carelessness and/or stupidity and hope that those who were offended will forgive me.

A pervasive shadow of a painful symbol

Erich was raised in the shadow of the wall.

His mother raised him. She worked in a 3rd floor chair factory less than a mile from "the other side." The other side was the better side. It was the side she would never know.

For 23 years she raised her son the best she could — within the confines of her wage and her country's ideology. She only wanted him to be happy, even if she knew that happiness was short-lived and perhaps artificial.

Erich hated his mother. He hated East Germany. He hated all his mother was — her willingness to listen and believe the propaganda, her fear of changing . . . of accepting his ideals.

And he hated the wall.

He wanted to leave his mother, his country, his life of drowning in a sea of state-sponsored oppression. He wanted to go to the other side, where people could live. He wanted to find freedom, and freedom was on the other side of the wall.

There was no escape. The wall was omnipotent; if not the wall, then certainly the police and their jails and the guards and their guns.

Erich used to sneak into the tavern near his home. He used to listen to the old drunk man in his tattered suit tell stories of a time when there was no wall. The man in the tattered suit would clutch his beer to his chest and quietly hum songs from years ago.

David R. Mark

Songs of freedom.

Songs of life where the air was clean and the trees grew tall and the children could learn all that they wanted. Songs of lands far away from life in East Germany, where the only true pleasures were found in one's imagination or after a night at the tavern.

Erich could never tell his mother how he felt, he assumed she wouldn't listen. In turn she knew he would not speak to her, and she only hoped that someday. . .

Then the changes came. Erich listened and read closely whatever information he could find, picking apart the state's propaganda from the worthwhile news of the fall of the Communist bloc.

He never discussed the fall of the bloc with his mother. She would just deny the facts and accept whatever the government said. She wouldn't understand.

Then the wall — the wall he had been raised with and despised — was the site of festivities. Erich went to the wall, and with his pocket knife began to cut. With thousands by his side he began to take down the obstruction to freedom. The wall so many wanted gone forever would soon be gone forever; the freedom so many would have died for was now for them to live and see.

Erich cried. He cried tears of joy and he cried for those who suffered because of the wall and all it meant.

Then Erich went back to his street. He could have gone to the tavern, but instead went to his home. He looked at his mother — the woman he hated — with tears in his eyes.

She began to reach for him.

They cried tears of joy together.

The decision last week to spare these accounts, which pay for consultants and temporary help, saved UMass students from additional fees next semester, he said.

More than 1500 students phoned the Statehouse during the past two weeks, and more than 2500 calls were made to representatives and senators combined, he said.

Kulik said the phone drive may be resumed in December, when the proposed tax bill goes to the Senate.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

The Good, the Bad, and the Possibility

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

The Escort Service at the University of Massachusetts has finally been restored to its "pre-budget cuts" level with help from individual donations and grants from the University and the community, said Carol Radzik, associate director of public safety.

The escort service, since the beginning of the semester has operated with only included the security officers, and the Escort Service could not employ any students due to the devastating budget cuts effecting the entire University, Radzik said.

Although the service is presently hiring more student escorts, she said there is at least one vehicle operating between 5 p.m. and 3 a.m., and 20 students on foot from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m.

"Many thanks to Chancellor Duffey, Vice Chancellor Madson, and Tracy Davis, [Student Government Association president]," she said. Davis has been very influential in bringing the Department of Public Safety's concerns to the students, Radzik stated.

"We just started Friday, and we've been able to handle all of our calls," Radzik said, adding that the reinstatement of the Escort Service is "fabulous," and that the community needs to be aware of the return of the Escort Service.

★ ★ ★ ★

But the Everywoman's Center has not been so lucky. With previous budget cuts totalling more than $80,000, and the inevitability of increased cuts next semester, the EWC is preparing to face even more losses.

Rumors have been circulating around the community that the EWC will not be in service next semester. "As far as I know, that's just a rumor," said Carol Wallace, EWC director. "I was told in July that the Chancellor talked to some faculty about the elimination of the Everywoman's Center, but I've been unable to get a response from the Chancellor about that," she said.

Chancellor Duffey and Vice Chancellor Madson were unavailable for comment yesterday.

The EWC has already lost two programs recently due to the University-wide budget cuts. "Given the pattern of cuts that I see, I fear that the Everywoman's Center is very vulnerable," Wallace said.

The Center has been trying to solidify their position as a community access service, and to appeal to the administration.

"The advisory board [of the EWC] is doing what they can to let the administration know that the services that we provide are critical," Wallace said.

The House Ways and Means Committee in the Massachusetts Legislature last week approved a bill that would allow survivors of rape to use state funds for abortion counseling and services.

This bill will be the legislature's first decision on abortion since the Supreme Court's Webster decision last July, which increased states' power in the abortion issue.

The bill, proposed by Rep Marjorie Clapprod (D-Sharon) three years ago, would change the victims compensation act to include abortion counseling and abortion services for rape victims.

The victims compensation act of 1985 includes a clause excluding compensation for victims of rape and incest from receiving state-funded abortion counseling and services, said Pam Nourse, executive director of Mass Choice.

"In previous years, the legislature wasn't willing to pass [abortion rights legislation]," Nourse said, adding that since the election of David Dinkins and Doug Wilder in New York and Virginia- two victories that depended largely on the pro-choice vote- there is "clearly a pro-choice momentum perceived in our country."

Since the Webster decision, Nourse said that there has been an "outpouring of support" to keep abortion legal.

But the bill still must pass through the House, and it will be brought up within the next couple of weeks, Nourse said. "We're activating our lobbying network . . . the House does not have a pro-choice majority," she said, adding that there are 63 pro-choice Representatives and 97 anti-choice Representatives.

Women examine eating disorders

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Correspondent

Eleven to 20 percent of all college-age women are afflicted by anorexia nervosa, bulimia, compulsive overeating, or chronic dieting, according to Arleen Thomson, a University Health Services nutritionist.

Thomson said she sees 20 people with eating disorders every week. The majority of them are women with bulimia, she said.

Bulimia is a disease in which a person eats a meal, feels guilty, and purges themselves by vommitting.

"Bulimia releases a lot of anxiety and feelings," said Thomson.

Bulimia and similar disorders are particularly difficult to control during holidays, according to Thomson.

"There is so much of an emphasis on food and drinking, people with eating disorders should plan how much the are going to eat before they sit down, maybe take a walk afterwards, and have a person they can talk to if they think they are going to feel the need to purge," she said.

Last night the Progressive Organizaiton for Women's Rights showed the film "Fear of Fat." The film showed women struggling with different eating disorders. Afterwards there was a discussion about the film and women's personal experiences with eating disorders and their own problems with their body image. The discussion was led by Carla Halpern, co-president of POWER.

The media, societal pressure, a person's family, and daily stress can lead to low self-esteem resulting in out of control eating habits and negative body image.

"Anorexics, bulimics, aren't women out of control, but are an example of society not letting women have control and forcing them to seek control through food," said Halpern, " the problem is not fat, food or weight, the problem is misogyny."

An open letter to the Women of the UMass community

After almost three months of begging and pleading with the University of Massachusetts community, we, the women's issues editors, remain understaffed.

The women's issues desk has historically served as a vehicle by which the multitude of issues and concerns so vital to women in this community receives adequate attention within the Collegian and throughout the campus. Without a sufficient number of writers, the future of this desk is in grave danger.

This desk was established in 1978 when the feminist community, outraged by a series of sexist incidents at the Collegian, took matters into their own hands with an occupation of the newspaper offices that resulted in the institution of the women's issues desk.

The desk was and continues to be a force addressing sexism, sexual harassment, violence against women, and other issues concerning women on campus, in the community, and in the world.

Since that time, the desk and its editors have struggled to maintain a voice for and about women on the pages of this newspaper. That voice is in danger of significantly quieting next semester, if the desk continues to be forced to operate without new ideas, without new stories, and without new writers.

The desk is now operating with two editors, and only two correspondents. This simply is not enough.

For the first time, we are making a public plea to the entire community to help the women's issues desk, and this page, to survive.

ARTS & LIVING

Self-indulgent, mediocre, pretentious prose

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

"The best lack all conviction, while the worst/ are full of passionate intensity." So wrote W.B. Yeats, the true genius of poetry that the 20th century has yet produced, in his masterpiece "The Second Coming."

What does that have to do with the arts page? Look at every major piece of art in the last year, decade even, and note how true Yeats' lines are today. Crass commercialism, invariably smothered in technology, is the fodder that adorns most publications, T.V. shows, et. al., in conjunction with what is known as "publicity," or free advertising.

Anybody, who has $10 can see a movie or listen to the latest musical pap. Crap art is, at the least, accessible, as the majority of our arts page testifies. Indeed, accessibility is the very life blood of the churning beast that is modern creativity (?). Without it there's no money, a big problem.

Ezra Pound, who came very close to being a great artist, was under the sad impression that art should be for an elite, a bunch of fascists, literally, as everybody else, that's the masses (a fair assumption that that includes you and me) would be incapable of enjoying such a splendid thing as art. This feeling of Pounds' had everything to do with his failure as a man and as an artist.

All these words and no point yet. What's ART ATTACK coming to? Well, for a points sake: Art should be accessible to every man and woman that wants it, and not in the processed, money making forms it currently is. The problem? Elitism, the height of literary pretension. Worse, though, is undeserved elitism.

There is a world, a part of which is on our very campus, called many names, most of which amount to Graduate Writing programs. To call it a world that produces the most machine like writers devoid of all heart, soul, feeling and literary talent would be an understatement, in my humble opinion as an undergraduate Comp. Lit. major. Will Blythe puts it far better than I, in his introduction to On Being a Writer, (to be reviewed):

"Since the teachers in these [graduate writing] programs understandably regard it as presumptuous . . . to teach "passion" and "vision," their students end up learning technique, the machinery of writing. Really it's writing as applied auto mechanics. The sort of novels Henry James called 'loose, baggy monsters' have been rounded up, caged and fed a starvation diet to turn them into sleek, aerobicized volumes."

ART ATTACK

Kurt Vonnegut agrees, saying: "Of course, a lot of creative writing courses teach you how to counterfeit energy, sincerity and involvement. It's a little like going to modeling school to learn how to put on your makeup and always be beautiful."

Unfortunately, this pseudo beauty is all the world has to look forward to, as publishers keep tabs on these writers who supplement their incomes by teaching such programs. This means that people who do not jump into such programs to "learn how to write" are generally less likely to break into the business of getting published. So more and more, the slavish hacks that inhabit these programs are the writers of the future. Lack of feeling, of any life experience beyond the womb of the educational experience, would seem to be all literary hounds have to look forward to.

And yet, these self same brats seem to be under the impression that there's something terribly important about them. There's no need to fall into the bitterness of examples or reasons (Freud would have had a field day), but this contradictory, unnecessary, self-importance, affected by writers who could only be, at best, as good as Hemingway was as a 19-year-old newspaper man is more than ridiculous, more than hilarious. It's sad. And it brings us back to Pound (without the talent), back to the very first line of this column.

As with all rules, exceptions can and do apply, but at this point only one man can be called upon for any wisdom, the exquisite, ever topical Oscar Wilde. In the introduction to his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray, he writes: "All art is quite useless."

Quite. But today, that statement is taking on new dimensions.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Finish old business before starting new projects. An authority figure will be difficult to reach today. Put requests in writing. Paying attention to detail is essential.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Your defensive armor could be penetrated by loving friends. Knock down the barriers to your creativity. Personal relationships need nurturing. An important question demands a thoughtful answer.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Caution is advised on projects that may look easier than they actually are. Take special care when plotting your strategy. Let financial experts advise you on wise investments.

CANCER(June21-July 22): Your emotions are volatile. Curb a tendency to act impulsively. Stay anchored in the present even if your mood is nostalgic. Welcome a last minute invitation to a Thanksgiving celebration.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Your keen sense of humor is appreciated by business associates under stress. Your outgoing ways are contagious, reducing arguments. A close relationship holds some interesting options. Take your time.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): The spotlight turns on you. Let your coworkers see your creative talents. Your business instincts give you a clear picture of your financial position. Devote more effort to personal matters.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): You could be tempted to say "yes" to everything but should avoid scattering your energies. Re-evaluate your priorities. Get more information before making a final decision.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): You could be getting ahead of yourself; slow down and consult partners. Teamwork is the secret to your success. An old friend has a get-rich-quick scheme; resist until you can research it.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Midday brings danger of self-indulgence. You might want to buy something without thinking of the financial consequences. The public library provides the place you need for research.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Keep your professional life and personal life separate. An older person offers unsolicited advice. Listen closely; you could learn some useful information. You enjoy playing the peacemaker at work.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): A newspaper article could give you a lucky tip. Try to get a better idea of where you are headed. Your dreams could reveal unfulfilled desires. If thinking of retiring soon, look for new projects.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Be more daring in expressing your personal views. People with creative ability are a source of inspiration. Show your affection for friends and family openly. Discuss your plans with mate.

UMass football bids farewell to 8 seniors

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

When football, or any sport for that matter, has been a part of your life for a long time, it is always difficult to tear yourself away and move on.

Saturday afternoon at exactly 4 p.m., the college careers of eight members of the University of Massachusetts football team came to a close. But it would have been hard to find a better way to end their careers than they did.

The Minutemen, long since eliminated from playoff contention, took to the turf of Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium with nothing to lose. On the other hand, the opponent, the University of New Hampshire, had everything to lose. Thus, the table was set for what was arguably the best win of the year for UMass.

Scoring three consecutive touchdowns, the Minutemen rallied from a 28-13 deficit to take a thrilling 34-28 win, knocked New Hampshire out of the playoffs and sent the eight seniors off into the sunset on a positive note.

"This is the greatest ending I've ever seen," said senior linebacker Sean Cummings. "I wish it was the first game."

Cummings joined fellow linebackers George Karelas and Drew Comeau, along with nose guard Joe Cullen, cornerback Garrick Amos, split end Chip Mitchell, tailback Steve Olson and guard Pat Phillips as the eight players who played their swan song Saturday. "It was a great memory. It's great to end a career like that," said Karelas, who finished as the leading tackler in the Yankee Conference and was named a Yankee Conference First Team All-Star. "I couldn't ask for any better."

Neither could Joe Cullen, who came to the Minutemen as a walk-on in 1986 and started all four years at nose guard. Cullen was named to the Yankee Conference second team.

"This is the best win ever," said Cullen. "Everyone came together. No one believed we could beat [New Hampshire]."

"Even if we were 0-10, we still would have gotten up for New Hampshire," Karelas said.

"This was our playoff game," Cummings said. "We wanted to send the seniors off right and start the 1990 season."

"I would have had no regrets even if we lost," Comeau said. "We had nothing to lose."

While a loss would have soured matters considerably for the departing cast, it wouldn't have overshadowed the positives for a group that has gone 24-19-1, won two conference championships and made an appearance in the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

"Everyone has been great the last five years," Comeau said.

"One thing I'm glad I never did is quit," Cummings said. "Just being here and being able to help out, is something I'll look at for the rest of my life."

The Golden Child: Freshman quarterback Gary Wilkos did not get the Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Year award, but he did add one more honor to his already-impressive list.

For his performance against New Hampshire, Wilkos was given the Golden Helmet Award for the University Division, as the top player in Division I play in New England. Wilkos completed 9 of 16 passes for 209 yards and two touchdowns, and also carried 22 times for a game-high 71 yards and a touchdown.

Don't blink . . . or else: Strange things happen when UMass and UNH get on the field, especially in the third quarter. It's almost as dizzying as watching Oklahoma and Loyola-Marymount. Only the Boston Bruins may be able to score more points in a shorter time period.

During last year's tennis match at Cowell Stadium, the two teams combined to score 47 points in a span of 9:44 in the third quarter. Breaking that down even further, UMass had 33 of those points in just 8:21, and the last 35 points of that run came in just 3:47 [pant, pant, pant].

Which brings us to Saturday's game. After UNH scored with 5:23 left in the third to go up, 28-13, UMass proceeded to roll off 21 points in 3:45, including a pair of drives that lasted 17 seconds each.

If only the Patriots had signed Pele instead of Greg Davis: Last fall, Rick Probstein spent his time kicking a round black-and-white object for Jeff Gettler's men's soccer team.

Saturday, Probstein got called on to boot an extra point in the third quarter. His short chip shot sailed through the uprights, bringing the Minutemen to within 28-26 in a game they would eventually win, 34-28.

"This is the first time I've ever been in a football game," said Probstein, who said he tried out for the team because it was "a challenge."

Update from the local M*A*S*H unit, the final episode: The season has drawn to a close without any more additions to this lengthy cast of characters. With that, we send this feature off into late-night reruns on Channel 38.

Around the YanCon: Turning back the clock to a hot August day in Boston, a certain scribe, aided by a free meal of steak, steamed clams and Bud Lite on draft, boldly defied all and picked Maine and Villanova to grab the top two YC spots.

Lo and behold. After wading through the tiebreaking procedure, Maine and Villanova formed the one-two punch, and will represent the league in the I-AA playoffs that start Saturday.

Other brilliant prognostications had Delaware fifth (although everyone else picked them first), Rhode Island eighth and Richmond ninth. Technically, Connecticut was third and New Hampshire fourth, with Boston University sixth and UMass seventh.

Intramural sports notices

Hoop season is upon us and whether you want to play in a campus wide league next semester or in a preseason tournament, if you're not to busy with finals, the intramural office has got what you want.

Entries are due on Monday, Dec. 4 for all those wishing to enter a team in the five-on-five basketball league in the spring semester.

There will be a meeting for all managers of preseason basketball teams on Wednesday, Nov. 29 at 6 p.m. in room 223 of the Boyden Building. It is a mandatory meeting for all managers of teams.

Boyden and Totman Gymnasiums as well as the rest of the recreational facilities in Boyden and Totman will be closed from 5 p.m. tomorrow until Sunday at 7:30 p.m. in light of the Thanksgiving weekend.

For more information about intramural sports coming up, contact the intramural office in 215 Boyden or call the office at 545-2693.

6 Minutemen cop YanCon All-Star honors

Karelas, Tulley named to 1st-Team

Six University of Massachusetts football players were named to the 1989 Yankee Conference All-Star team which was released yesterday.

Senior linebacker George Karelas and junior linebacker Matt Tulley were named to the first team, voted on by the Yankee Conference coaches. Karelas led both the Minutemen and the Yankee Conference with 152 tackles this season. Tulley is a repeat winner, having been named to the second team last year as a sophomore.

Named to the second team were senior split end Chip Mitchell, junior tackle Kai Dietiker, junior guard Anthony Guidice and senior nose guard Joe Cullen.

Maine quarterback Mike Buck was named Offensive Player-of-the-Year, while Connecticut defensive end Troy Ashley was tabbed as Defensive Player-of-the-Year. Delaware quarterback Bill Vergantino edged out UM quarterback Gary Wilkos for Rookie-of-the-Year honors, and first-year Maine coach Tom Lichtenberg shared Coach-of-the-Year with New Hampshire's Bill Bowes.

Democratic leaders call for additional taxes

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Dukakis and Democratic legislative leaders agreed Tuesday new taxes are needed to solve the state's $721 million deficit but did not devise a specific revenue-raising package to balance the budget.

However, the chairmen of the Senate and House Ways and Means committees separately suggested tax increases in the range of $500 million or more would be needed to solve the state's fiscal crisis.

"We are in fundamental agreement. We are going to do everything we can to maximize savings, to reduce unnecessary spending, but it is clear there still will be a need for new revenues," Dukakis said after a two-hour private meeting called by Senate President William Bulger, D-Boston.

Senate Ways and Means Committee Chairman Patricia McGovern, D-Lawrence, left the meeting in an upbeat mood about solving the fiscal crisis that has paralyzed state government for months and resulted in a state credit rating tied with Lousiana as the lowest state in the nation.

"I will characterize it as the single best meeting I have been at in the last three years with all the principals involved," McGovern said, predicting the crisis could be solved by year's end.

House Speaker George Keverian, D-Everett, and McGovern said there was no agreement at the meeting on the size or nature of the tax package the Legislature would consider to balance the budget.

McGovern said it would depend in part on the amount of savings and budget cutting the Legislature can achieve.

The House passed a bill last week that it pegs at $365 million in savings, but which Senate analysts have said could be lower.

She said she planned to report the House-passed bill from her committee to the Senate floor in about two weeks after cooperating with the House and the Dukakis administration to find the maximum amount of savings.

Keverian indicated a tax bill could reach the House floor as early as next week, possibly by Wednesday.

Keverian refused to speculate about the size of the tax package, saying it would be premature.

House Majority leader Charles Flaherty, D-Cambridge; House Ways and Means Chairman Richard Voke, D-Chelsea; and Senate Ways and Means Vice Chairman Robert Wetmore, D-Barre, also attended the meeting, as did Administration and Finance Secretary L. Edward Lashman and Dukakis' chief of staff, S. Stephen Rosenfeld.

Before the meeting in Bulger's office, Voke said a figure of about $500 million would "be in the ballpark."

"There is no question that some revenues are needed to bring the state into a sound fiscal condition," Voke said.

McGovern said she would stand by an earlier estimate that at least $500 million in new taxes would be needed.

Voke said he was looking to raise taxes that would not damage the already fragile state economy and said, "Clearly there could be some movement on the sales tax."

Voke said he appeared to be in a minority in the leadership in opposing an increase in the state capital gains tax.

Senate Republican Leader David Locke, R-Sherborn, interviewed after the meeting to which he was not invited, said higher taxes could send the state economy into a tailspin.

Students urged to rally support for tax package

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

In reaction to yesterday's announcement that a tax package is in the works, local community leaders yesterday urged University of Massachusetts students to do their part over the Thanksgiving break in persuading state legislators to support the package.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima said, depending on the size of the tax package, it could lead to the Statehouse restoring funds to public higher education; in turn, the decision to raise students' fees next semester by $350 could be reversed.

"Tell legislators that if they support education and taxes and they come through on the Rosenberg Resolution, we'll support them come election time next year," he said.

The Rosenberg Resolution, passed by the House of Representatives last Thursday night, commits state representatives to restoring funds to the public higher education system.

The resolution's architect, Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, said in order to restore $100 million to state programs for this fiscal year, between $460 million and $560 would need to be generated through tax revenues.

Rosenberg also forwarded a bill, now pending before the senate, that would restore the $25 million to higher education that was reappropriated by the House.

"The strongest role students could play now is talking with their friends and neighbors and their legislators," Rosenberg said. "Tell them that we can't solve this without raising taxes, not just to balance the budget, but also to restore funds."

Joyce Hatch, the University's budget director, said students must encourage their parents, friends and legislators to support the package which, she said, is likely to be introduced into the Statehouse next week.

"The timing is great for students," she said. "They should let legislators know they're registered voters and that they'll be voting in the next election."

Interfaith ceremony held for Salvadoran martyrs

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Community members gathered at the Newman Center last night for a vigil in memory of the six Salvadoran priests and two lay women murdered in San Salvador one week ago.

About 150 people came in from the cold to celebrate the strength of the El Salvadoran people and share the anguish the decade-long violence there has created.

Members of the Leverett Buddhist community drummed instruments rhythmically as names of the slain Jesuits and women were read.

The Rev. Joseph Quigley, director of the Newman Center, introduced the service with a prayer: "We trust in love and hope that these cruel deaths will have not been in vain, and that our solidarity will be a support for those who grieve."

Julieann Rapoport worked in El Salvador and described the country sides of rolling hills as beautiful and then delved into the actual situations confronting the people.

"There are five million people in El Salvador and one and a half million are refugees of one form or another. There is an extreme poverty that can not be understood unless you have seen it yourself," Rapoport said.

But it is by no means a country without riches, she said.

"Eighty percent of the nation's income goes to 20 percent of the people; 400 children die each week because of malnutrition," said Rapoport.

Although she cited hunger and misery as pervasive realities, she said a tremendous sense of faith, hope, and struggle exists in the El Salvadoran people. Mike McDonnell, a Jesuit who worked closely with the eight who were recently slain, said the internal strife existing in El Salvador mushroomed to violent insurrections about 1979.

The civil conflict is between the military and government alliance (supported by U.S. aid) and the FMLN or the popular opposition.

"The FMLN represents a good portion of the people. They are the sons and daughters of peasants. Often, they are the very young sons and daughters, 13, 14 years-old," McDonnell said.

What began as an attempt to participate in the government electorally did not work, he said, so the people turned to violence.

Names of the men and women killed last week were hung on posts in front of the Newman Center chapel. After the memorial ceremony, about 75 people braved the frigid weather and proceeded to Amherst Common, some with lighted candles, some carrying the placards with the names to the Common.

Rapoport said the priests were martyrs whose names would join a long list of people who were killed before them.

In his reflection, McDonnell said the priests became those around them.

"They deflected tension away from themselves and onto those with no name. They participated in pastoral, rural work. [These men] had a great love for those with no name, no money, and no significance," he said.

"Their collective earnings tended to their own needs and gave the rest of their money to the needy. To look at their lives is to look at those they loved," McDonnell said.

One of the priests slain was in Washington D.C. two weeks before his death to receive a human rights award. During his acceptance speech he said it was a duty to work for human rights.

The Jesuit leadership in the U.S. wrote a letter to Congress two days after the killings asking that the El Salvadoran government end "flagrant human rights abuses" and demanded an end to all military assistance to El Salvador.

The campus visitors' center, which has served about 80 people each day since its opening, soon will mark its first year anniversary.

Robsham visitors' center to celebrate anniversary

By WILLIAM FLEISHMAN
Collegian Staff

As the Robsham Memorial Center for Visitors approaches its first-year anniversary, members of the campus community are encouraged to visit the facility, according to Robert N. Brooks, director of Student Affairs Information Services.

The brick building, which has carriage-house style and is located on Massachusetts Avenue, first opened its doors on Nov. 28, 1988.

Brooks, who is also the supervisor of the facility, said the RMVC has been successful in its primary function of providing information to prospective students and their parents.

"Since it's opening, we've served close to 25,000 people — about 80 people per day. During active months, we may see over a 100 visitors come through during the day," Brooks said.

According to Brooks, the purpose of the facility is to make the campus more "user friendly" by providing a central location to serve and assist visitors in obtaining accurate information, referrals, and materials about the University and the surrounding area. There are also displays of University research and public service projects.

"We do everything from posting signs and providing maps for summer counseling right down to handing out disposable raincoats for rainy days," he said.

The money for the construction of the building was a gift from E. Paul Robsham Jr., a former member of the University's Board of Trustees, in memory of his son who died in an automobile accident several years ago.

Robsham's donation of $385,000 encompassed 98 percent of construction costs. Additional funding for equipment and interior furnishings were provided as a reunion gift from the class of 1955.

Salvadoran guerrillas raid hotel, 'trap' guests

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) - Armed guerrillas raided a luxury hotel Tuesday, trapping dozens of foreigners inside. Rebels said they "captured" four U.S. military advisers.

Soldiers in an armored personnel carrier rescued the secretary-general of the Organization of American States, who had been in a different part of the El Salvador Sheraton Hotel when the guerillas attacked before dawn.

The army moved tanks and hundreds of soldiers into the western neighborhood of Escalon to combat the attackers, who were renewing an urban offensive that had appeared to be dying out. At least 1,000 people have been killed in the offensive, the largest of the decade-old civil war.

The Bush administration denounced the rebel advance and said the United States was "making plans as necessary" to protect the lives of Americans. White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said no options — including military ones — were being ruled out.

The attack comes one day after President Bush reaffirmed strong U.S. support for President Alfredo Cristiani's rightist government. The United States has provided about $3.5 billion to oppose the insurgency, in which more than 71,000 people, mostly civilians, have died. Fifty-five U.S. military advisers now are in El Salvador.

An AP reporter saw at least six armed military men, believed to be the U.S. advisers, barricaded on the fourth floor of the "VIP Tower" of the hotel, which is no longer part of the U.S.-based hotel chain. Guerrillas and an unknown number of guests were on the fifth floor and guerrillas on the third floor.

Salvadoran troops were deployed at the hotel's main building, 100 yards from the five-story "VIP Tower."

Speaking to reporters who made their way into the tower, one of the Americans said that he and his companions were not hostages, but could not leave.

"We would like to leave," he said. "We're here because we feel we can't leave safely."

'Robin HUD' indicted

BALTIMORE (AP) — "Robin HUD," the woman who admitted stealing millions of dollars from the government and giving some of it to the poor, was indicted Tuesday in one of the most prominent cases of the Housing and Urban Development scandal.

Marilyn Louise Harrell was charged with embezzling $5.6 million from HUD, making false statements to the federal government and making false statements in connection with a loan application.

The indictment sends a "firm message to those who think it's 'business as usual,' when dealing with HUD. We have zero tolerance for theft, regardless of the reason or how it is done," HUD Secretary Jack Kemp said in a statement issued before a news conference Tuesday afternoon.

"This case represents perhaps the largest single theft of government funds ever charged against an individual," Attorneuy General Dick Thornburgh said in the statement.

Evidence presented to a federal grand jury in Baltimore allegedly showed that Harrell, who was entrusted with HUD funds as a private escrow agent, misused government money on occasions, HUD and Justice Department sources said Monday.

Attempts to reach Harrell's attorney, federal public defender Anthony Gallagher, were not successful. A receptionist at his office said Gallagher was in court on a unrelated matter.

Harrell's testimony to Congress was among the most dramatic during six months of hearings into allegations of fraud, mismanagement and political favoritism at HUD during the Reagan administration.

A discrepancy between the $5.5 million Harrell testified about and the $5.6 million mentioned in the indictment could not immediately be resolved.

Two weeks after Harrell testified, HUD seized her house in Washington's

ARTS & LIVING

A rock and roll potpourri from The Bowery

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

We're very lucky here in the Pioneer Valley. Unlike most areas of the country, the local rock scene here actually consists of some quite talented bands. Sure, the scene is not as big as Boston's, but it's a hell of a lot cheaper.

You'll have another chance to see one of those "should be huge but isn't" bands tonight, as The Bowery play Katina's.

Winners of the WHMP 99.3 FM talent search showcase last year, The Bowery has a sound that can best be described as indescribable. They've often been called an original rhythm and blues band, but their covers of Lou Reed, early Jefferson Airplane and The Animals, as well as many of their originals, contradict that.

Stephanie Whitman, a back-up vocalist for the band, said, "Our music has a real alternative, progressive sound to it. Rick [Les, the band's songwriter, vocalist and lead guitarist] likes to call it 'rhythm rock' because there's a lot of changes in rhythm and harmonies."

The remainder of the band consists of Robert Ostowski on drums, Brian Oakes on bass, and Whitman and Joanne Shumacher on back-up vocals.

Les is a self-taught guitarist influenced by Neil Young and Jimi Hendrix. While in the band Spaces, he toured Poland on the Solidarity Tour for striking students. Ostrowski has played with four different bands, and bassist Oakes, a former member of the Pixies, and influenced by Husker Du and the Feelies, brings an alternative edge to the group. Whitman and Schumacher both have had extensive voice training in everything from rock to jazz to classical. Their sweet harmonies, which they create themselves, give the songs that special Bowery stamp.

The Bowery play Katina's tonight

"A lot of people tell us that we sound like the Doors, that we have that same twangy guitar sound," said Whitman. "But then our be-bop songs, like 'Charolette Bronte,' sound like the B-52s."

Many of Les' songs have a street-wise, New York flavor to them. The song "The Bowery" is about an elite New York place where people go "just to be there," while outside, bums huddle on the steps in the cold.

The diverse sounds of The Bowery are evident in their live shows as well. After an enormously successful show at Twister's, they were immediately invited back for future gigs. Besides tonight's Katina's show, they will soon be playing Pearl Street, and will be opening for the Romantics and the Neighborhoods in the summer.

Little Charlie's Big Break: A mammoth advantage for us

By B.J. CRAWFORD

The Big Break
Little Charlie and the Nightcats
Alligator

"You're dangerous with that guitar, man. They're gonna put you in jail!"

That was John Lee Hooker to Little Charlie, of Little Charlie and the Nightcats on their new release, The Big Break, and it couldn't be more true.

RECORD REVIEW

The Big Break is Little Charlie's third release on Alligator records, and it's just that, the big break. It's a wild mixture of R&B and rockabilly, which has won acclaim from blues superstars like Robert Cray and Rich Berry.

With song titles like "I Beg Your Pardon," "Don't Do It" and "Dump the Chump," Little Charlie has a comical blend of lyrics, and a rockin' blend of blues similar to Albert Collins.

Featuring Little Charlie Baty on guitar, Rick Estrin on harmonica and lead vocals, Jay Peterson on bass, and Dobie Strange on drums, the band got its first big hit in 1986 with their debut album, All the Way Crazy, on Alligator. Since then, they have appeared worldwide at blues festivals.

Called one of the nations top touring groups, Little Charlie has been described as being on the cutting edge of blues. The influence of Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf and Eddie Taylor, whom members of the band have mixed and played with at one time, is clear.

Their previous release, Disturbing the Peace, won major AOR radio play and out sold the debut. So far blues lovers its clear that their newest release, The Big Break, is a must hear and out of control.

Albums are rated on a five star basis with five stars being the best.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Congressional office groupies

COLUMNIST'S CONUNDRUM: "If a writer pens an article, but no one is around to read it, is it worth the writer's effort?"

Tomorrow is Thanksgiving. The student exodus home began last Thursday — draining today's campus readership by at least 87 percent. To those die-hards who do actually read this, I express my eternal gratitude.

Most people swoon over Hollywood. Mapped tours of movie stars' homes are popular there. In Tinseltown, opportunities to glimpse Clint Eastwood's gardener or Sally Field's mailbox are cherished.

Darren Garnick

But Hollywood is stale stomping ground. Too crowded. Too glitzy. My roommate Tom and I recently discovered a perfect alternative location to mingle with celebrities (or as the Boston Herald calls them, "celebs").

Washington.

Scoff if you will, but to Tom and I, the novelty of walking by a congressional office is equivalent to the thrill a metalhead would feel walking backstage at a Bon Jovi concert.

Last week, armed with a camera and an endless supply of sarcasm, the two of us combed the Russell, Hart, and Dirksen senate office buildings — in a quest to meet Dan Quayle's secretary. Tom and I simply desired to chat politics with her or him over some hot cocoa.

Our dream was never fulfilled.

However, we did manage to socialize with the office staff of some of the most prominent legislators on Capitol Hill. Snooping around like the Scooby Doo gang looking for clues, we peeped our heads in doors with recognizable nameplates.

Regardless of its senator's political leanings, we approached each office with the same script: "Hi! We are long time supporters of Senator (fill-in-the-blank). Would it be possible for us to pose for a photo with one of the office staff? We want to express our appreciation for all the work done behind the scenes!" We achieved mixed success . . .

- Ted Kennedy, John Kerry (D-Mass.): Both offices were packed with kids fresh out of college, sympathetic to our whims. Teddy K's secretary cried camera shyness, taking a picture of us sitting on the Kennedy couch instead. Kerry's secretary, however, posed with us without any hesitation — like fan requests for pictures were routine to her.
- Al Gore, Jr. (D-Tenn.), Sam Nunn (D-Ga.): The myth of Southern hospitality has some legitimacy. Nunn's staff gave us snack packs of Georgia peanuts as parting gifts.
- Jesse Helms (R-N.C.): Well, maybe the hospitality myth is just bunk. Before we even said a word, Helms' staff gave us the evil eye. "We don't do THAT here," they said. Coming from the office of the tobacco puppet, the arrogance did not surprise me. Helms obviously loves lung cancer and hates college kids.
- Paul Simon (D-Ill.): His aide invited us back for coffee and donuts with the senator. Need I say more? (Unfortunately, we declined because of academic commitments.)

Wonderful. So what relevance does this anecdote have to you, the reader? Well, clearly my experience is allegorical evidence of the superiority of the American system. Would the Kremlin ever tolerate two wise-ass college kids roaming around the Politburo?

Keep rally in perspective

Mr. Garnick, you were asking for it. In writing "The pro-cynic perspective," (Nov. 15) you opened a door through which thousands of people can enter solely to trample all over you. Your article not only does a dismal job in reporting on last Sunday's pro-choice rally in Washington D.C., it also manages to offend anyone claiming to be pro-choice.

The pro-choice movement's main objective is to keep abortion legal and accessible to all women, regardless of financial status. The movement is supported by millions of people, not just women, across the country. Because of its size, the pro-choice population is incredibly diverse. Each individual has a different way of showing his/her support, whether it be by carrying the symbolic coat hanger or by wearing a button that simply states "Choice." One must keep this in mind and accept it while attending any large rally, regardless of the rally's message.

In addition, one must also remember why thousands of people have gathered together in the first place. In this case it was to support safe, legal and financially feasible abortions for all.

I've said my piece. Now I just have one question: why were you there?

Constance Hayden
Amherst

Just another week for our legislature

It's been a bad week. But then again, when wasn't it? And it's only half over.

The cowardice of our state legislators is old news, but it looks like they've finally gotten around to eliminating free tuition for college employees and their immediate families, under pressure from Barbara Anderson, Jerry Williams and Howie Carr.

Al Arpad

It's not clear yet whether the public actually thinks that college employees don't deserve education benefits. Most people probably didn't know or care that college employees get education benefits, but the minute the information hit the pages of the Herald, the issue was already settled.

Probably no other benefit is as important in attracting employees to the University. The pay here is not especially good compared to other opportunities that are available, and the health plan is no better than average. Only the opportunity represented by a tuition waiver distinguishes a college job from any other job on the market.

And the really crazy thing is that every other college I ever heard of, public or private, offers some kind of tuition benefit to its employees. If we really want to make sure that Massachusetts' public higher education is staffed by hacks who can't get a job anywhere else, this is the way to do it.

But that's not the worst, by a long shot. In El Salvador, government sponsored death squads killed six priests, while the regular military killed at least 500 other civilians.

Actually, nobody knows that the government gave direct orders for the priests to be killed. In fact, they probably didn't. All we really know is that there is no possibility that the guilty parties will ever be caught or prosecuted, and I guess the guilty parties know that too.

That policy of discouraging death squads with nothing but a wink and a nudge is indistinguishable from the conduct of Manuel Noriega or Ferdinand Marcos, both of whom were big pals with George Bush from way back, until the political heat got to be too much.

Unfortunately, there is no sign of effective political heat developing on El Salvador. The same people are marching, but Congress yesterday decided not to vote on reconsidering the $1.5 million sent to El Salvador each day.

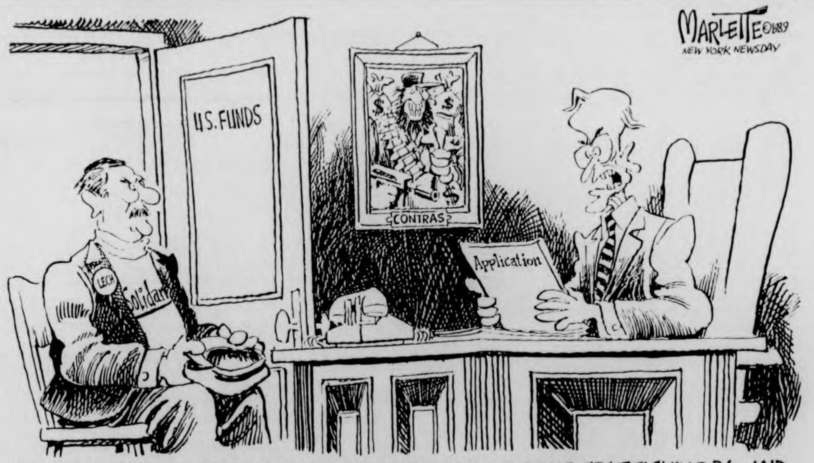
But did they do it because they believe in the current government of El Salvador? Not really. It seems they were afraid that any hot issue might keep them from adjourning for the holidays. As far as I'm concerned, that beats the Massachusetts Legislature for sheer inhumanity any day.

The only good news is that Paul Tsongas decided not to run for governor. I say that not because I believe that Paul Tsongas would be a terrible governor, sacrificing the infrastructure of the Commonwealth in order to cozy up with industry.

I say that not because I think any other candidate can help this god-forsaken state. I'm just glad Paul Tsongas pulled out of the Governor's race because he would have won it walking away, and that would have made my job as a political writer very boring.

Frankly, I can't wait to graduate and move away from here.

Al Arpad is UMass student I think?



" WHAT?!...NO ARMS DEALS, NO CIVILIAN MURDERS, NO DRUG TRAFFICKING?!.. AND YOU CALL YOURSELF A FREEDOM FIGHTER?!"

Keep benefits of others in mind

How dare Paul Morris? His editorial "Irresponsible Accusations" (Nov. 20) was by far the most irresponsible accusation made yet.

In her appeal to strikers at last Friday's rally, Lisa Nelson commented on the sexist structure of the strike and of society. She simply used Morris' reporting as an example of the sexist structure since his article was a sad and gross representation of her greater points.

Not only is his editorial petty, but an attempt to obscure and invalidate Nelson's point of a very real sexism by shining about alleged slander and crushed ego.

Would this personal vendetta have ever made it to print if he were not on staff?

Sorry to say but Morris' response has only made Lisa's point stronger: that men too often get the credit, that women's opinions and representations are ignored.

As far as his "integrity" as a reporter, we have many of the same contentions as Nelson does. Saying that Morris quoted three men because "their ideas were interesting" implies that the women he talked to had nothing interesting to say. How many UMass women did he actually interview?

In 1989, with countless gender issues unresolved, we should not have to explain tokenism to the Collegian. It is not enough to list the women quoted. (Are we supposed to swoon under his psuedo-progressiveness?) A constant, active integration of women must take place on this campus and everywhere. Morris too used Nelson as a token.

We need to explain why Nelson made the speech. There were gender problems within the strike. By concentrating on how Nelson's speech affected him, Morris succeeded in ignoring the real issue.

If Morris intends to become a responsible reporter, we suggest that he sit back and examine reasons for writing. Being a responsible journalist requires taking into consideration issues larger than oneself and sacrificing a little glory for the benefit of others. Please take our criticism as a recommendation and not as an attack on his ego.

Recently the physical barrier that separated two nations for some 28 years, the Berlin Wall, has been removed.

An event of this caliber will certainly have some effects on nearly everyone around the world.

What do you think are the short-term effects of its removal? Has the Cold War defrosted?

If you could forecast some of the long-term effects, what would they be? Who would they most affect?

Will they affect you in any way?

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Concentrate on your long-term goals. A foe becomes an ally. Tie up loose ends concerning a partnership. Talking shop tonight could pay off handsomely. Review current investments.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Greater emphasis is placed on travel and distant contacts. A new contract will help you boost your earnings. A last-minute invitation pleases someone who would otherwise spend Thanksgiving alone.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Complete routine chores early in the day. It may be difficult to reach an authority figure. Write vital memos and letters before leaving the office so you can truly relax tomorrow!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be realistic about your schedule. Complete essential work but do not fret if others are focused on Thanksgiving. News from afar corroborates an idea you had. Give romance a second chance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Take the lead in a moneymaking venture, but avoid incurring needless risks. Emotional fulfillment deepens in a current romance. Be wary of financial entanglements with friends.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Order flowers or buy a small gift for your Thanksgiving dinner hostess. Be patient when dealing with someone who is cranky; he may be ill or beset with stressful personal problems.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A visitor from afar could open the door to a brighter future. An authority figure's friendly advice is right on target. Listen closely. A relative or friend may want to play Cupid.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Get an early start if going out of town today. Public transportation could prove more reliable than travelling by car. Go ahead and mix business with pleasure tonight. Romance is on the right track.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Save your money; refuse to play a long shot. A newspaper article shows you the need for community volunteers. Follow up; your services will be in great demand. Pursue self-improvement activities.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 23-Jan. 19): Carelessness could result in a loss. Put valuables in a safe deposit box before leaving on a trip. Telephone family members if you will not be together for Thanksgiving.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Today gives you a chance to catch up on detail work and still have time for fun. Sharing secrets with children helps overcome a generation gap. Romance becomes more intense.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Homemakers should get a head start on preparing Thanksgiving dinner. Make that special dessert. An out-of-town visitor will enjoy getting into the cooking act. Entertain at home tonight.

The building was officially dedicated during commencement weekend last May.

The ideas for the content and composition of the facility were derived by examining the good and bad points of similar universities across the country. Brooks said he is always looking for different ways to improve the facility's services.

"We're always adding to the information content — it's a continuous process," he said.

The RMCV's staff is comprised of a full-time receptionist and is augmented by experienced student workers.

"They were specially recruited, based on their knowledge about the University, diversity, poise, articulateness, sensitivity, and skill in dealing with the public," Brooks said.

The Robsham Memorial Center for Visitors is open to the public from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on weekdays and from 10:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. on weekends.

HUD

Maryland suburbs as well as several other properties she said she purchased with HUD money to help charities and homeless families.

"I in no way justify what I have done as being anything less than sin," Harrell, who was dubbed Robin HUD by federal investigators, testified before a house subcommittee in June. "I do, regardless of where my life takes me from here, intend to repay in full all monies taken."

Harrell said she was easily able to withhold money from HUD. Several top officials in HUD's Washington field office, to which she reported, were fired because of the Harrell case and other alleged mismanagement.

Harrell is one of a dozen escrow agents susupected of keeping more than $10 million they were supposed to transfer to HUD. Efforts to indict them and seek restitution are at various stages. Harrell is the second escrow agent to be indicted.

When she lost her house in late June, Harrell, 46, said she was moving in with her mother in the Maryland suburb of Fort Washinton. Attempts to reach her were unsuccessful; the mother's telephone number is unlisted.

The indictment charges Harrell with embezzling about $5.6 million belonging to HUD between November 1985 and December 1988; giving false explanations to HUD for her delay in remitting department funds, and lying about her net worth in an application to the Second Federal Savings Bank for a $150,000 loan.

Minutewomen to open season against Vermont

Women's hoop to play Saturday at Cage

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

While most of us will still be digesting mom's cooking or nibbling on the Thanksgiving leftovers Saturday, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will be hosting the University of Vermont at Curry Hicks (2 p.m.) in the season opener for both teams.

UMass head coach Kathy Hewelt begins her second campaign with the Minutewomen. Last year, UMass was 11-18 overall with a 4-14 Atlantic 10 record which placed them eighth in the league.

"I'm looking forward to getting the first one under us," Hewelt said. "Last year we had a real tough game at Vermont. This year it's at UMass which is a difficult place for teams to play us because we're so comfortable here."

In their only meeting last year the Minutewomen defeated the Catamounts 60-52.

Hewelt will send out a starting unit of 6-foot-2-inch junior co-captain Keyburn McCusker and 5-foot-8-inch senior co-captain Sue Serafini at the forwards, 6-foot-4-inch senior Helen Freeman at center and 5-foot-11-inch senior Michele Pytko and 5-foot-9-inch rookie Patty Robak in the backcourt.

With Freeman and McCusker the top returning scorers (12.8 and 10.1, respectively), UMass will obviously funnel much of its offense into the post area. Yet Hewelt is looking for a more balanced offense as compared to last year.

"Our inside game is very solid for us," Hewelt said. "But this year we've balanced it with a solid perimeter attack. The three is going to be a bigger part of our offense this year. We have people throughout our roster who can hit it. Last year we didn't have that."

Hewelt is counting on Serafini (6.1 ppg last season) and Robak to ring up the treys this year. Serafini led UMass with 31 three-pointers last year (31-90, .345).

If UMass is to have a potent inside-out attack, it will be the result of Pytko's play. The senior point guard from Southbridge will be the central figure in the UMass offense as the chief distributor.

"She's got excellent ball handling skills," said Hewelt. "So far in the preseason she's done very well at spreading the ball around."

Vermont was 7-18 last year while playing in the North Atlantic Conference. Coach Cathy Inglese welcomes back her two leading scorers in 5-11 senior forwards Allison Mahan (10.3) and Kristen Shaeffer (10.2). This duo also led the Catamounts in rebounding last year.

How big is this non-league game for UMass and Hewelt?

"This is very important for us. We need to get off on a positive foot. We play our non-conference games to gear up for the Atlantic 10," said Hewelt.

Hoop notebook: The only injury to report is 5-foot-4-inch junior Trish Riley. Last year's assist leader, the guard is out with an inflamation above her right hip.

Nazi-hunter speaks at UM

Nazi-hunter Beate Klarsfeld

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Nazi-hunter Beate Klarsfeld, taking time out from her schedule of tracking, exposing and bringing to justice Nazi war criminals still at large, is scheduled to speak tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Born in Berlin at the start of World War II, Klarsfeld was unaware of the Nazi horrors surrounding her. A German Protestant, she learned of the Holocaust when she met her husband Serge, a French Jew whose father, a member of the French Resistance, perished at Auschwitz, a Nazi concentration camp during World War II.

Klarsfeld vowed to dedicate her life to continuing where the Nuremberg Trials left off. The trials convicted some Nazis for committing crimes against humanity. She was determined to find unpunished Nazis and demand their extradition for trial.

In 1968, Klarsfeld propelled herself and her cause into the international spotlight by slapping in the face West German Chancellor Kurt-George Kiesinger during an appearance in West Berlin. Klarsfeld, jailed for the slap, forced the media to focus on Kiesinger's Nazi past.

The Klarsfelds are best known for their efforts to bring Klaus Barbie, the "Butcher of Lyon," to trial. Barbie — the Gestapo chief in Lyon, France — deported more than 8,000 people to concentration camps and participated in more than 4,000 murders.

The Klarsfelds first discovered Barbie in 1972 in La Paz, Bolivia under the alias Klaus Altmann. Along with Holocaust survivor Ita-Rosa Halaunbrenner, Klarsfeld chained herself to a park bench across the street from Barbie's office building, demanding his extradition to France.

During the 1970s, the Bolivian government sneered at France's extradition request, and provided Barbie with special military protection. But in 1982, Hernon Siles Zuazo, who had no political ties to Barbie, seized power.

At the Klarsfeld's urging, France renewed its efforts to extradite Barbie. A year later, Barbie found himself in a Lyon jail awaiting trial. In 1987, he was sentenced to life in prison.

In their book, The Nazi Hunters, authors Charles Ashman and Robert J. Wagman wrote that the Barbie case "proves that the tenacity and dedication of even one or two persons [the Klarsfelds] can overcome the roadblocks thrown up by governments who would protect or forget the perpetrators of the Holocaust."

Yehudit Heller, program director of UMass Hillel, echoed this sentiment. "If there is one lesson that Beate Klarsfeld taught me, it is that one person can make a difference.

"When you are little and asked what you want to do when you grow up, you say you want to help fix the world," Heller continued. "Beate Klarsfeld is actually doing it. Nothing scares her."

In 1986, Klarsfeld, not knowing a word of Arabic, traveled alone to Beirut to confront a group holding five Lebanese Jews hostage. In an unsuccessful attempt to diffuse the crisis, Klarsfeld offered herself to the "Organization of the Oppressed in the World" as a "substitute hostage."

Committee to discuss research on campus

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

An ad-hoc Faculty Senate committee was established this semester to examine research policy on campus as a result of last semester's protests against Department of Defense-funded research at the University of Massachusetts.

The Ad Hoc Faculty Senate Committee on Research Issues will hold their first public forum tonight at 7.30 p.m. in Thompson Hall 102.

Chairperson Paul Shuldiner said the committee hopes the forum will be an opportunity for the campus community to express their ideas about University research issues.

"It's not intended to be a committee report, but more a gathering of information for use by the committee," he said.

The committee is asking participants at tonight's forum to prepare written statements that can be presented in three minutes or less in order to accomodate as many people as possible, he said.

Shuldiner, a civil engineering professor said the committee will probably present their report to the Faculty Senate by the middle of next semester. The committee has not yet debated the major issues concerning research on campus, he said.

"The major issues are the funding and the conduct of researchers," he said. "The bulk focuses on Department of Defense-funded research and its potential applications, explicit or implicit."

Some 150 demonstrators, mostly UMass students, were arrested last semester during their protests against military-funded research. Among other assertions, the protesters claimed that the University's Microbiology department is conducting research on the anthrax virus that is in violation of the 1972 international treaty on biological and toxin weapons.

Committee member Howard Ziff, a journalism professor, said there are other types of University research policies that the committee needs to address.

However, Ziff said the committee has so far discussed how research documents can be made more easily accessible to the public.

"The object is for the average member of the community who wants to find out what's going on to be able to do so," he said.

"It's an enormously complicated research job for the committee. To get to where people understand what's happening means a lot of unpacking of red tape."

Vigil tonight for Milk

Bay area pol among first openly gay

By CHRIS MACEK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance is sponsoring a candlelight memorial vigil for Harvey Milk, who was shot on Nov. 27, 1978 by former San Francisco City Councilor Dan White, scheduled for tonight at 7:00 p.m. on the Student Union steps.

White also assasinated then San Francisco Mayor George Moscone. At the time of his death, Milk was a City Councilor in San Francisco.

Milk was one of the first openly gay, lesbian or bisexual politicians elected to office and he frequently expressed his belief in the importance of "being out".

Milk said, "If you are not personally free to be yourself in the most important of all human activities — the expression of love — then life itself loses all its meaning."

Following the candlelight vigil, the UMass Program for Gay Lesbian and bisexual Concerns will host the first Harvey Milk Memorial Lecture tonight at 8:00 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Angela Bowen, editor of Black/Out and Co-chair for the National Coalition of Black Lesbians and Gays, is scheduled to be the featured speaker.

Bowen, a Cambridge writer and speaker, is currently working on several short stories. She will be speaking on Harvey Milk's life both personally and politically.

Milk's killer, Dan White, was sentenced 5 years in jail for manslaughter. White served three years before being released on probation and committed suicide two years later.

Part of White's defense appealed to excess stress and anxiety due to an overdose of junk food, later referred to as the "Twinkie defense." "A man climbs into city hall through a window," said LBGA member Brad Robinson, "shoots two men to death in cold blood, serves three years because Twinkies were on his brain, and they called it justice. We commemorate this day not only for Harvey Milk, but in outrage at the so-called 'justice' system which continues to treat gay, lesbian and bisexual people as second class citizens."

Ghandi may be edged out

NEW DEHLI (AP) — Early returns Sunday showed opposition parties edging out Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Congress Party in parliamentary elections that will determine the fate of the world's only democratically elected dynasty.

Following the bloodiest vote in modern India's 42-year history, tallies showed the governing Congress Party leading in more races than any single opposition party but trailing the combined total of opposition parties. It was falling short of enough seats to form the next government without entering a coalition.

Voting started Wednesday in most of India's 25 states and seven federally governed territories. By the time polling ended Sunday in the states of Punjab, Bihar and tiny Sikkim, at least 136 people had been killed in election-related violence.

The election also was marred by widespread ballot-rigging, voter intimidation and murderous assaults that prompted the election commission to order re-votes Monday in one-fifty of the country's 590,000 polling booths - including about 18 percent of the booths in Gandhi's own constituency of Amethi.

According to state-run television's "trend reports," based on incomplete counting in 365 of 524 parliamentary constituencies, Congress was ahead in 158 races while major opposition parties led in a total of 173.

"The Congress Party is no longer going to be the majority in the next government," the television declared.

While the Congress Party was expected to sweep the southern states, it appeared to be in serious trouble in the north, its traditional stronghold. It also was losing ground in the east and west.

Congress still could emerge as the single largest party, making it the likely choice to try to form the next government of the world's largest democracy. But it would be forced into an uneasy alliance with Hindu fundamentalists or the Communists.

The National Front, led by former Gandhi ally Vishwanath Pratap Singh, was leading in 80 contests.

The right wing Hindu Bharatiya Janata Party, or Indian People's Party, which had only two seats in the last Parliament, led in 71 races. The Communist Party of India-Marxist was ahead in 22 contestrs.

At stake were 524 seats in the Lok Sabha, or House of the People, the policy-making lower house of Parliament that will choose the next prime minister. Voting was postponed in several districts because of incomplete voter lists or candidates' deaths.

Opinion polls indicated Gandhi and his Congress Party would win from 170 to 220 seats, less than half of the 415 seats they won in the December 1984 elections that propelled Gandhi to power, and far short of the 267 needed for a simple majority.

EMERGENCY - Paramedics and Boston Police rush to the attention of William Hughes, 8, after he was run down by a speeding Jeep allegedly atolen by a 14-year-old in the Dorchester section of Boston Saturday.

Hughes was trapped against a light post until paramedics arrived at the scene. Officials had to restrain the boy's mother, Cornelia Hughes, as she fought to get by the side of her son.

The child is in stable condition at Boston City Hospital.

Discovery to land in p.m.

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — Space shuttle Discovery headed for a rare night landing in the Mojave Desert on Sunday after a four-day secret mission that put a spy satellite into orbit.

The five-member crew was expected to ignite the shuttle's re-entry rockets for a fiery, hourlong plunge through the atmosphere and a landing at 7:02 pm PST at Edwards Air Force Base, Calif.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration said the weather outlook for landing on a lighted runway was acceptable, with a forecast of a clear sky and visibility of more than seven miles.

Winds of 14 mph, gusting to 21 mph, were predicted. NASA said it does not want to land a shuttle at night with more than 12 mph crosswind, but the astronauts have a selection of runways to avoid a broadside hit.

Discovery was slated to be only the third shuttle in 32 missions to land at night. Its launch Wednesday was the third after dark.

Although as many as half a million people have flocked to the desert air base to watch previous shuttles land, Sunday's landing was closed to the public because the mission was classified.

Most news about the flight was blacked out on Pentagon orders since Discovery blazed away from Cape Canaveral, Fla. NASA was allowed to make only periodic statements that the spaceship was doing fine and to announce the landing time.

The after-dark liftoff and touchdown were dictated by the need to put the shuttle's satellite in a specific orbit and by the military experiments conducted by the astronauts. some of the experiments were believed connected with the "Star Wars" missile defense system.

Sources close to the project said earlier that the astronauts achieved their main goal Thursday when they released the 2 and a half ton, $300 million satellite to earsdrop on military and diplomatic communications in the Soviet Union, Europe, Africa and the Middle East.

It was believed that the astronauts also conducted research into how people can serve as military observers in space.

News Briefs

Search Continues

BOSTON (AP) - The Coast Guard yesterday moved its air and sea search for five fishermen to the waters about 180 miles south of Nantucket. Despite the help of Navy aircraft from as far away as North Carolina, there have been no signs of the men missing since Wednesday.

No Cash For Notetaker

CAMBRIDGE (AP) - The case against a Massachusetts state police trooper charged with rape and attempted extortion may be jeopardized by a lack of money to pay a stenographer, the defense attorney says.

Gorby Steals A Slogan

MOSCOW (AP) - Mikhail Gorbachev is showing solid support for East Europe's reformers by calling for socialism with a "human face" - the same phrase used by Czechoslavakian progressives the Kremlin toppled with a military intervention in 1968.

Covert Bickering

WASHINGTON (AP) - The State Department, FBI and armed services hampered the CIA in its infancy by bickering about authority over covert activities and other operations, according to a long-secret history of the spy agency's early years.

Joy Ride Ends Sadly

BOSTON (AP) - An 8 year old boy was hospitalized in critical condition after being struck by a speeding stolen jeep driven by a 14 year old boy. William Hughes, a third grader, was pinned against a steel traffic light pole while bystanders tried futilely to free him.

U.S. Navy Ship Arrives For Superpower Summit

VALLETTA, Malta (AP) - The USS Belknap, the American naval ship to be used for the superpower summit, arrived in Maltese waters yesterday. Maltese officials said the Soviet cruiser Slava is expected Tuesday or Wednesday.

Malta gave the summit ships diplomatic clearance after both the United States and the Soviet Union conformed with a Maltese Parliament resolution prohibiting ships carrying nuclear armaments from entering Maltese territory.

President Bush and Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev are to meet Dec. 2 and Dec. 3 on the ships.

No Verdict Yet in Sedition Trial

SPRINGFIELD (AP) - No verdict was reached yesterday as jurors ended an 18th day of deliberating the fate of three people accused of trying to overthrow the government by force.

Prosecutors allege Raymond Levasseur, his wife, Patricia Gros Levasseur, and Richard Williams were members of a terrorist band that robbed banks and bombed buildings along the East Coast from the mid-1970s to 1984.

The three defendants face charges of racketeering, racketeering conspiracy and seditious conspiracy, a charge that has been rarely used since it was invoked to prosecute Confederate loyalists in Civil War times.

Salvadorans see weeks of violence ahead

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — The two deadliest weeks of the 10-year-old civil war have served only to set the stage for more bloodletting.

The battle of San Salvador - at least the first one - is over. The huge revel offensive that began Nov. 11 failed to achieve its principal objective of persuading the government to make significant concessions in the quest for a negotiated solution.

Indeed, with the administration claiming victory and demanding what amounts to the rebels' surrender, and the insurgents promising to only expect weeks or months more of warfare of an intensity unseen since early 1981, when the rebels' first "final offensive" failed.

"This battle against ARENA is a battle that cannot turn back, a battle to sweep fascism once and for all from our country," the rebel clandestine Radio Venceremos said late last week. ARENA is the rightist Nationalist Republican Alliance, the governing party.

"They (the guerrillas) tried, and they lost," President Alfredo Cristiani said, proclaiming the military defeat of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, or FMNL.

The government contends its forces killed or wounded a third of the rebel army, estimated at about 7,000 full-time combatants. Most foreign journalists who spent day after day in the combat zones doubt the official claim that more than 1,000 guerrillas were killed.

The figure appears inconsistent with the relatively few dead guerrillas seen by reporters who daily compared notes on what they saw where and when.

Cristiani says the decimation suffered by guerrilla forces has been so telling that they will be capable from now on of only "terrorist" actions.

The contention is suspect, as the president, the defense minister and every colonel who went on record in the months prior to the spectacular push said the same thing; that insurgent capacity had been reduced to isolated terrorist activity.

Cristiani acknowledge in an interview after the fighting waned last week that the guerrillas "are doing some things that look more like regrouping than withdrawing."

Radio Vencermos on Friday referred to the 10-day concerted assault on the capital and several provincial cities as "the first period of offensive," implying that others are in the offing.

The war began in late 1979, but its roots go back decades.

El Salvador is the smallest country on the Western Hemisphere's mainland. With 5 million people in an area the size of Massachusetts, it is also the most densely populated.

The consolidation of landholdings by relatively recent immigrant families - not of the centuries-old Indian-Spanish mix that makes up more than 90 percent of the population - disenfranchized hundreds of thousands of peasants who raised subsistence crops on collectively held village lands. Landless peasants became migrant peons who went seasonally from the coffee harvest to picking cotton to cutting cane - the workforce of an economy that was almost completely dependent on the export of those three products.

The agricultural export economy made vast fortunes for a tiny elite. The rich have mansions on their plantations, sumptuous homes in the capital's posh western sector and houses or apartments in Miami, New York or Los Angeles. They tune in to U.S. television stations with their satellite dishes and send their children to U.S. Universities while two-thirds of the population lives in dire poverty.

Philly band is on a mission to greatness

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

The greatest thing for a music enthusiast is seeing a band that's just starting out and watching that band mature and gain a following.

Tonight, the Iron Horse offers a chance to see the band of the 90s, as Innocence Mission, featuring the exquisite vocals of Karen Peris, play in support of their surprisingly mature and brilliant self-titled debut album.

PREVIEW

With a name like Innocence Mission, combined with Peris' ethereal voice and song titles such as "Surreal," and "Wonder of Birds," one would expect a highly pretentious band that snacks on tofu and meditates six times a day. But Karen Peris and her husband Don, the band's guitarist, do not resemble that image at all.

In a telephone interview from their Los Angeles hotel room (where their tour begins), the pair were personable and down to earth, even if they have grown to love the home of basketball's dreaded Lakers.

"We were out here making our record for nine months," Don said. "We learned what areas to stay away from, like Hollywood."

"At first, I just hated the architecture and everything," Karen said. "There's no history. But then I started seeing little cottages and fun things. I made a lot of friends with the people we worked with."

The band, which includes Mike Britts on bass and Steve Brown on drums, began seven years ago in Philadelphia, when four high school friends decided to mold their musical creativity together. In a rarity for rock music, the band has kept its original line-up to this day.

Their sound is wonderous and emotional; it's backbone is Karen's vocals. Not since Annie Lennox or Kate Bush has a voice been this genuine and moving. She is the perfect blend of Bush, Sinead O'Connor and Kristen Hersh (of Throwing Muses). Karen said her vocal influences include Bush, Jane Siberry, the Cocteau Twins and Bjork Gudmundsdottir (of the Sugarcubes).

"It's my voice," she said, "but when you listen to other people, you can't help but be influenced by them.

Karen is also the band's lyricist. Her subject matters range from a family questioning their brother about his fiancee ("Curious"), to a 19th century French Impressionist painter talking to his girlfriend ("You Chase the Light"). "Some of the songs are just made up stories," she said. "Some are things that have happened with my family. I sometimes hear or read things that just touch something off."

Don, who writes the music with Karen, said the band has already written six or seven songs that they have been performing.

"I think they're getting a good response," he said.

Karen is excited about the band's first major tour.

"It's great to go out and see if anyone's actually listening to the record," she said.

People are listening, and they're loving what they hear.

Mr. Rogers strolls in the Soundgarden

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff
Louder Than Love
Soundgarden
A&M Records

O.K. boys and girls, the question of the day is, what music inspired thrash metal and post modern?

That's right, the hardcore movement of the late '70s.

And what do we call the music genre that takes the brassiness of hardcore, the power and crunch of thrash, and the moodiness of post modern? Very good, it's called crossover.

So what group offers the latest in crossover fare? Well done, it's Soundgarden.

Their recent vinyl effort,Louder Than Love, is truly impressive. A nice balance is achieved among the lyrics, the music and the emotional content. There's not much repetition since each song has its own vibe. With these ingredients, what do we have? Excellent, we have a good album that's worth a listen.

Lyrically, the content is reminiscent of hardcore. As M.O.D. once put it, it's short but sweet. On "Hands All Over," it's political: "I think we're falling/ From composure/ Hands all over Western culture/ Ruffling feathers and turning eagles into vultures." On "Big Dumb Sex," it's just plain harsh: "Hey I know what to do/ I'm gonna fuck you."

Soundgarden play better than they dress

Each musician adds his own sound to the music. Guitarist Kim Thayil plays a bluesy stomp to Hiro Yamamoto's crunchy bass line. Drummer Matt Cameron seems to find a balance between blues and thrash. While Chris Cornell, who at times sounds similar to Robert Plant and at other times sounds similar to the Cult's Ian Ashbury, delivers gut wrenching vocals which packs an emotional power punch. One particularly good song on this album is "Gun." It starts slowly with a grinding rhythm. Then it builds with intensity until it explodes at its height. You can imagine the mosh pit forming in this climax and when you can listen to a song and see the mosh pit you know that that song is good. (For those who don't know what a mosh pit is, it's the area right in front of the stage where people throw themselves against other people and throw themselves off the stage when the music becomes intense.)

Critics charge that this group rips off Led Zeppelin and Black Sabbath and therefore has nothing new to offer us. I say, "Bulldinkies." I can definitely hear Sabbath influences in the bass line and power chords and Cornell has assuredly studied the Robert Plant Primal Scream Techinique. However, they utilize these influences in their own way. This is definitely a different kind of music, no ifs, ands, or buts about it.

Go buy the album.

Albums are rated on a five star system, with five stars being the best.

Parents aren't so bad

For so long, throughout the wonderful, terrible years of junior high and high school, I had two problems. One was my mother. The other was my father.

"It was the best of times, it was the worst of times" — stealing a phrase from Dickens. The best of times were when I was not in a ten-mile radius of my parents, the worst of times when I was.

Gayle Long

They never understood.

They could not comprehend my quest to be "cool" and "in." The tone of my refusal when they asked me if I would like to go to the movies on a Friday night said it all: Are you crazy? Just leave me ALONE!

So, I went through my pre-employment days putting down the attempts they made to clothe and feed me. They sincerely tried, but being in the desperate state of puberty, I was only aware of mistakes such as corny jokes and playing Johnny Mathis while my friends were in the house.

Then came the threat of my driver's licence.

I really think that my parents were ready to go crazy. The slamming on the breaks at every intersection, the cut corners and wrong way turns down one-way streets may have had something to do with it.

But, they put on their seat belts, installed an imaginary break petal on the passenger side and smiled through gritted teeth. My mother may have even kissed the ground a couple of times after a couple of close calls, but she tried to make sure that I was not looking.

They took care of everything for me: payments for driver's education, filled out my tax forms, even typed out my college applications (yes, I can type now). I never realized how much they would do for me. Until the tuition bills started coming home.

I know that, for my family, college is a privilege. I knew my parents went to work everyday to earn money, and a big chunk of that was paying for my education.

I also realized what a jerk I was to my parents. Then I came home and saw my 16-year old brother playing the same selfish mind games with my parents. Except that he was better at it and carries it to a higher degree. He is so good at it he can get my parents to feel sorry for him when he's grounded.

Therefore, he never remains grounded for very long.

While I was home over Thanksgiving break, my brother squeezed out almost $100 out of my parents. Because he was sick and could not work, he claimed that his social life would suffer if he had to stay home. So my parents gave him some money, then called me in to drive him over to his friend's house.

The king of manipulation had done it again — he did not even have to let the tears well up in his eyes. All he did was LOOK pathetic and they gave in.

Poor parents, they do not understand that the money he "borrowed" is gone, spent and never to be re-paid. He has got them so snowed that they do not know any better.

My parents are hard-working people. They care enough about me to pay for my education. For them, it is truly a sacrifice, one I will always remember. It makes me guilty to think that I was such a self-centered, selfish person, like my brother is today. I guess I did not comprehend that they had to work for the money, and they were not even working for themselves. They were working for me.

Now I look back and appreciate them. What they are doing for me is great. I've even tried to explain it to my brother. But it's over his head. He still thinks they are here to make his life miserable. He is a typical teenager who thinks his parents are out to get him.

Too bad he can't figure out that they just want him to grow up.

The spirit of the strike lives on

Officially off strike for a little over a week now, I returned to a quiet UMass yesterday after the break, but I bumped into a strange-looking man at one of the entrances of Herter Hall.

Bob Bobala

He was short, with a shaggy brown beard, and his face had been smeared with greenish-black camouflage paint. He was walking around and around in a small circle, every so often stomping his old, black army boots against the pavement. Hanging from his neck was a huge cardboard yellow sign that said in big block letters: "STRIKE TO THE DEATH!"

"Excuse me," I said. "Strike to the death of what?"

"We must strike until the Legislature bows down on its knees before us, or until every student of public higher education in this state can no longer walk, talk, or breath, and finally just collapses on a picket line!"

"But, the strike is over," I said.

He stopped walking around in circles and stepped right up to me. "This strike is not over!" he shouted, and a small bit of his saliva flew into my eye. "We have accomplished nothing! This strike cannot end."

"Well, I agree with you there," I said, with one eye closed. "In spirit, the strike certainly cannot end. But how can you say we haven't accomplished anything?"

"The Legislature has not been brought upon its knees! We—"

"Have you been out here all through Thanksgiving break?"

"Through the snow and all. And not a soul has crossed my picket line."

'Well, that's an accomplishment,' I said, looking around me at a desolate campus that had not yet returned from vacation.

"It's not enough!"

"I know. I know. The Legislature must be brought to its knees. But we're getting there — even though we're going to classes. Don't you see that?"

"See what? All I saw was a handful of people picketing and singing a line from Eddie Murphy's stand-up routine: 'We can't afford it. We can't afford it.' They probably didn't have any ice cream either, but I still don't see how Eddie Murphy played a bigger role in the strike movement than the Chancellor."

"But, 4,000 people registered to vote in their home districts during the strike week — many of them for the first time, realizing they are political actors in this state. That wouldn't have happened without such a large movement as the strike. I'd call it an accomplishment."

"But we didn't even take over a building or block off a road and really shut the University down," he said.

"The press would have wrecked us if we did that. Thousands marching through downtown Amherst and a human chain from the campus to the post office got the message out. Not to mention the phone calls and the letters to the legislators. I bet more calls were made during that one week than were made all semester."

He walked around me in a circle for a few seconds, staring down at his boots. Then he stopped and cracked his neck back and forth. "Apathy," he said, gazing out at the bus stop. "Apathy still has a grip on too many students."

"Well, you're never going to completely stomp out apathy. But don't say that to the 40 or so people from my dorm (one of the smallest on campus) who got up at 6:00 a.m. one day to participate in the strike. Don't tell them they're apathetic!"

"Six o'clock, huh?" he said, starting to walk in circles again. "I don't care. I'm gonna stay right here at Herter Hall until Christmas."

"Okay, you do that. But, while you're out here, tell people to keep calling their legislators, and to lobby, and to campaign for legislators or their opponents who support public higher education. Keep telling people what you said: It's not over."

And with that, I saluted him and he raised his hands in the air and shouted, "To the death!"

A gay, lesbian, bisexual culture exists

ACCESS is a Registered Student Organization made up of leaders from the historically oppressed minorities on campus. We intend to be a unit which can act/react to incidents on campus which affect oppressed minorities, work together as a coalition to bring about positive change on this campus and empower ourselves in a world that oppresses us.

Recently, the term "multicultural" has become the center of a debate concerning the status of historically oppressed minorities within society. Various agencies and individuals use the term and part of their purpose is frequently stated as working to make UMass a truly multicultural environment. One must first have a working definition of "multicultural," to achieve success.

The gay, lesbian, and bisexual community has been told by the Collegian that they do not fall under the definition of "culture" and do not have access to the Multicultural page.

The gay, lesbian and bisexual community is a culture, with concepts, habits, skills, arts, institutions and a history dating back as far as the dawn of humankind.

We as members of ACCESS firmly believe that no strong definition of "multicultural" could possibly exclude the gay, lesbian, and bisexual community. Gay, lesbian, and bisexual issues should be covered in the Multicultural Affairs section. There should be an editor or associate editor overseeing issues of gay, lesbian, and bisexual concern working to minimize homophobic reporting throughout the paper as a whole.

Same holiday time, same holiday channels

Thanksgiving weekend is more than just fowl food. It is three (or four, if you're lucky) days of repeated history, every time one goes home.

Here is an example: back in 1985 a group of high school juniors went to the one of the many local movie theaters.

There wasn't much else to do on that spring night — except for practicing sine/cosine mnemonic tricks for the Calculus test next Monday, or maybe thinking about sending away for college applications due next Fall.

They had a great time — having gotten in for free (they knew all the ushers, mostly from homeroom and Gym), the popcorn for half price from the best friend of one of the little brothers in the group, and the front row of balcony seats (that section opened just for them once they snuck upstairs and started the trend).

It was one of the opening nights of a new but obscure movie, known only for its "Family Ties" star Michael J. Fox. (Someone in the crowd loved him in the show, and insisted they see that movie. It was met with some objection, but in the end, she won.)

That was okay. The group liked it, or so you'd think — they went back again to see it some eight times before it finally left, without a hint for a sequel, in the spring of 1986.

For months until graduation, favorite lines became conversation starters, the brunts of many "private"jokes and still more reasons to go to see it again — for free.

Alise Harfield

Some four years later, on the weekend that never failed to bring them all back home if not for anything but food and friends, the group re-assembled at one of the household headquarters, borrowed one of the parents' cars (and money), and returned to the General Cinema to see "Back to the Future Part II" as college seniors.

Let the deja vu begin.

It was the same people, different ages. Same theater, different ushers. Same town, more noisy teenagers in the audience. Same movie, different version.

Aside from paying an exorbitant price for the movie and the mushy, over-salted popcorn, sitting on the main level and watching a different movie, it was as if they hadn't left the theater since the last of the eight times they'd been in it.

The laughs were there, the private jokes recalled from years ago, the popcorn thrown with renewed strength to those noisy high school kids.

It seemed as if one is never too old to go back home for ol' T-day and its antics, original yet traditional.

There may be a new way to baste the bird, mash the potato, invite new friends or far-away family for the occasion, assign someone else the dish washing, but these parts of the day are never overlooked.

Thanksgiving is a time not only for thanks as its name suggests, but for reunion, for renewal of things-done-old.

So they are older now, on the brink of college graduation, but they behave the same way when given the opportunity.

In fact, I'd bet that over Winter Break, the group will go back to see Part II at least a half-dozen more times.

They will, that is, if I have anything to do with it!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do not let others distract you with their petty disputes. Deal with difficult matters as they arise. Do not overanalyze someone's actions. A relationship can be salvaged.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Children need a sympathetic ear, not lectures. A bold approach will help you win a new job or contract. Sudden acceptance by a previously indifferent group should give you pause.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You should encounter friendliness wherever you go today. New financial gains or a job offer are possible. Early Christmas shoppers can find excellent bargains.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Confirm travel arrangements; a mistake could prove embarrassing as well as costly. Wealth does not guarantee success. A long-distance relationship may be frustrating but could prove worthwhile.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): By leaving a margin for error, you can save yourself considerable wear and tear. Take the time to do careful research. Long-distance communications will boost business or a romantic relationship.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not hurry a project. Quality, not speed, is what counts with an authority figure. Pay attention to your close friends; they truly want to help you. Loved ones need reassurance. Be appreciasive.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Play it cool with someone who does not understand your motives. Get expert advice before making a financial or career decision. Change your routine to prevent boredom.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your words become more powerful when followed by decisive action. Be very diplomatic when handling a challenge from a group of people who work behind the scenes. A community project is inspiring.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Others will trust you even more after you fulfill a promise. Your special gifts allow you to serve mankind in a way few people can match. You benefit from your efforts to help children.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your ingenuity helps you find a way around a financial limitation. Do not let your standards slip. Make things easy for a friend or relative who has to work overtime. Offer to baby-sit.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): When you accept new responsibilities, you boost your earning potential. A change of lifestyle will require the cooperation of your roommate or spouse. Do-it-yourself decorating saves money.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Several heads are better than one now. Key associates could have strengths you may lack. Follow your usual routine. You may have to appease a close ally if you want continued cooperation.

MENU

Due to circumstances beyond our control, The Collegian was unable to obtain menu information for today. We deeply regret this error, for we pride ourselves on our ability to accurately provide a menu, each and every weekday, for you hardworking students on the meal plan, and we realize that this omission probably screws up your whole day because now you don't know whether to brave the fierce winds of November in the Pioneer Valley by trudging all the way to one end of this frozen tundra of a campus only to find that the D.C. is serving Okra squares in yogurt sauce again instead of remaining in the student union and just opting for whatever it is they serve in the Hatch in those grease-soaked wax paper bags that you can never get anyways because as soon as the 'food' you ordered is ready some moron barges ahead of you to claim it, leaving you to claim his/her mayonnaise-smothered patty-shaped meat product between those oh-so-digestible white nutritionless buns that just s-l-i-d-e through your digestive tract requiring virtually no digestive effort on your part or perhaps opting for something at Earthfoods.

A kaleidoscope of musical mayhem

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

The Bridge: A Tribute to Neil Young
Various Artists
Caroline Records
 and a half

The Bridge: A Tribute to Neil Young by various (sic) artists, is a cleverly innocent, even drippy looking, album cover, behind which lurks some of the 80s more revolutionary musical proteges.

The link between post-punk overkill garage bands as varied as Bongwater and Dinosaur Jr. is perhaps not so distinct from the nasal twang of one of the most venerable icons of rock 'n roll.

RECORD REVIEW

With Freedom firmly establishing that Young has jammed his foot into the glass door of musical mediocrity for the hundredth time, it must be just a tad chuffing to be recognized by a collection of bands that is essentially the core of all worth in American white music today.

Strangely enough, it's the one English boy, the brilliantly gothic (not a contradiction in terms) lousy novelist, breathtaking vocalist Nick Cave who takes the listener down, far down, into the mine shafts of sound, always providing a breath of light with a just short of amazing rendition of "Helpless" that leaves you aching for more.

The Flaming Lips yet again prove their worth, doing something with "After the Goldrush" that throws vulnerability, feedback and attitude into a cement mixer of harmony, (the most appropriate metaphor) causing much necessitated repeated listenings.

The Pixies, Sonic Youth, and Dinosaur Jr. all do almost exactly what you'd expect, only the Pixies do it softly, with more reverence on "Winterlong" and Dinosaur Jr. turn "Lotta Love" into a war zone expressing some kind of warped respect through the utter ireverance of the freshly amputated, without anaesthetic, vocals of one Artie Sinatra (also known as Lou.) The Youth are exactly as thay should be, too much so, making "Computer Age" a tour de force that's becoming a little repetitive, but ever loveable.

A worthy and endlessly enjoyable album (with my personal exception of the over long "Only Love Can Break Your Heart" by the over everything but talent and originality Psychic T.V.), The Bridge didn't leave my new mega Bass Walkman until the monster machine died, aged 21 days, in the arms of Henry Kaiser singing "The Needle and the Damage Done."

"I know that some of you don't understand/ I sing the song because I love the man . . ." True.

Good food and a good view at a good price

Want an alternative to the D.C.? Try the 11th floor of Campus Center called, obviously, Top of the Campus.

Students enrolled on the meal plan may use their card as a $3 credit on any dinner entree Tuesday through Thursday evenings, plus receive a 15⁄ discount if they make reservations two days in advance, said Richard Ellis, manager of cash operations for auxiliary services.

The TOC offers a scenic view of the UMass campus

"It's too bad students don't utilize some of the best food in the Valley when they go out, especially since they get a discount," he said.

Entrees are inexpensive to moderate and food is available for every palate, including chicken, fish and steak. Friday and Saturday night roast prime rib of beef is offered. The TOC, which has a full bar for those who can imbibe, offers an elegant candlelight setting with a terrific view of the campus.

Unlike the common trend in restaurants, the TOC serves warm loaves of bread rather than dinky cold rolls. However, the TOC serves the bread with those irritating little plastic containers of butter, rather than whipped butter. Unless you want a little salad with your dressing, you should also ask the waitperson to place the dressing on the side since the TOC has a habit of drowning lettuce.

Other than those idiosyncracies the meal and service was terrific. The baked scrod was light and flaky with just a touch of spice in the crumb topping. The rice pilaf, one of three choices, was a blessing for those used to the D.C.'s version of stone-hardened so-called rice. And the portion was large and almost too much to finish.

So when the parents come to visit, kill the proverbial two birds with one stone and show them the campus from the 11th floor and get a good meal (on them hopefully).

Strummer clashes with pop culture

By NICK OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Earthquake Weather
Joe Strummer
Epic
* and a half

Earthquake Weather is a schizo smorgasbord of gourmet dishes and day old fast food take out.

About a third of this is truly thumbs down odoriferous, the material just plane lame. On the other hand there are some I would not mind hearing every day, such as "Leopardskin Limosines" and "Sikorsky Parts."

Zander Schloss on electric and Spanish guitars is a firebreathing, fingerpicking Gargantuan and Lonnie Marshall, Willie MacNeil and Jack Irons on bass and drums are solid as bedrock. Furthermore, Strummer's lyrics, oblique as they are sometimes, wake you up at sunrise and shoot you between the eyes.

From "Leopardskin Limosines:" "Noontime the lunchstand tilts/It's you baby walking in with your stilts/You don't have to eat here no more/Cos the sauerkrauts been on the dog bowl floor . . . People gonna wanna Xerox you baby/What'll it do to your mind/Hang gliding off the Grand Canyon/In a Coney Island for the blind."

And from "Jewellers and Bums:" "Check into a car wash, eat out at the Bowlmore/Go buy a rose at the movies on a train/Get married by a biker, go hang a priest/Walk tall with a dwarf and you'll find relief."

For an Englishman, Strummer has quite a fascination with American culture, or lack thereof.

As I add it all up, though, Earthquake Weather is a false alarm, marred by weak material, interspersed with a few tremors. Anyone for a Clash reunion?

3 smart ways to help pay for college.

Here's how the Army Reserve Alternate Training Program can help you pay for college.

THE MONTGOMERY GI BILL

If qualified, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $5,040 for current college expenses.

STUDENT LOAN REPAYMENT

If you obtain a qualifying student loan, you can get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater—up to a maximum of $10,000. Selecting certain specialty training can increase the maximum to $20,000.

PART-TIME INCOME

And here's how you can make even more part-time money while in college. Take Basic Training one summer. The next summer, complete skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,250 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll train with your Army Reserve unit near college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll earn over $85 a weekend to start.

This could be the smartest way to get the money you need for college.

Young 'Cats prove their worth against Michigan

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Sophomore forward Sean Rooks said Arizona's young basketball team had something to prove.

And challenging fourth-ranked Michigan's inside power head on, the sixth-ranked Wildcats knocked off the defending national champions, 82-75 in the Hall of Fame Tip-Off Classic.

"Some people got down and doubted us," Rooks said, a reference to Arizona being beaten 71-60 by the Australian National Team in an exhibition game. "And we had that in the back of our mind."

Arizona coach Lute Olson had a special strategy for dealing with the defending champions.

"I figured if we could get one or two of their big guys in foul trouble they would be hurt," he said.

His squad obliged and Michigan lost two front-court starters, Terry Mills and Loy Vaught, on fouls down the stretch.

"It surprised me that they were so successful inside," Mills said. "They were a young team and they wanted to come out and make an impression on Michigan — and they did."

After Mills, who finished with 16 points, went to the bench with 5½ minutes left, Arizona went on a 16-7 run, rallying from a 68-66 deficit.

Michigan's Rumeal Robinson, the free-throw hero of the NCAA championship, was the game's top scorer with 27 points, but this time the foul line belonged to Rooks. The 6-foot-11 sophomore, who led Arizona with 20 points, sank six consecutive free throws in the final minutes.

"It wasn't just me," said Rooks, who came off the bench to earn most outstanding player honors. "All the big men came together and made us solid in the middle."

"We have to give Arizona credit," Michigan coach Steve Fisher said. "They got the ball inside and got our big men in foul trouble. We didn't stop the inside play. We were not prepared to handle it."

"I really can't say we were nervous," Robinson said. "Arizona just played a good game. I missed too many free throws and too many outside shots."

Arizona led 46-41 at the half as small forward Jud Buechler eclipsed the entire Michigan team on the defensive boards with eight rebounds and sophomore Matt Othick drilled three 3-pointers.

Arizona extended the margin to 54-45, early in the second half. But Michigan came back to move in front, 66-63, on a 3-point shot by Robinson and a free throw by Mills with eight minutes left.

Matt Muehlebach then tied the score with a 3-pointer for the Wildcats. Michigan regained the lead briefly, 68-66, but Brian Williams, a sophomore transfer from Maryland triggered the decisive charge for Arizona.

Williams, who had 12 points in limited action while recovering from a foot injury, tied the score at 68 with two free throws. Buechler followed with a layup and Othick had two more free throws for a 72-68 lead.

Rooks then added six free throws and Muehlebach put in two more.

WINGING IN THE RAIN — Pittsburgh Steelers running back Merril Hoge ran through the rain and the Miami defense on his way to three touchdowns yesterday as the Steelers beat the Dolphins, 34-14.

Jaeger boots Pats, 24-21

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Jeff Jaeger kicked a 32-yard field goal with 5:57 to play, giving the Los Angeles Raiders a 24-21 victory over the New England Patriots despite three touchdown passes by Steve Grogan.

The Raiders used 8:31 in moving 53 yards on 13 plays to get in position for Jaeger's game-winning kick, which just barely passed inside the left upright.

The Patriots didn't threaten after Jaeger's field goal, getting just one first down. An interception of a long Grogan pass by Terry McDaniel at the Los Angeles 38-yard line with two minutes left ended the final New England threat, and Grogan was intercepted on the game's final play from insdie his own 30.

The win broke a two-game losing streak for the Raiders, who have a 6-6 record. The Patriots fell to 4-8.

Although eliminated from contention for the AFC West title, the Raiders remain in contention for a wild-card berth.

The Patriots tied it 21-21 on a 34-yard pass from Grogan to Hart Lee Dykes with 6:52 left in the third period. The score came one play after a 10-yard punt by Erroll Tucker.

An 11-yard touchdown run by Steve Smith just 2:59 into the third quarter put the Raiders ahead, 21-14.

Smith scored two plays after Tom Benson intercepted a pass by Grogan and returned it 17 yards to the New England 33. A 15-yard facemask penalty against Robert Perryman at the end of the return moved the ball back to the Patriots 18.

The Raiders took a 7-0 lead by driving 76 yards in 10 plays the first time they had the ball. They scored on a 12-yard pass from Steve Beuerlein to Mike Alexander on third-and-goal with 3:52 left in the first quarter. It was the first NFL touchdown for Alexander, a backup wide receiver.

The Patriots tied the score by moving 87 yards on 11 plays in the second quarter. The drive was capped by a 1-yard pass from Grogan to Cedric Jones with 8:05 left before halftime.

The Raiders were penalized four times for 38 yards on the drive, including a 23-yard pass interference penalty against McDaniel which put the ball at the Los Angeles 3-yard line.

New England went ahead, 14-7 less than four minutes later on a 43-yard pass from Grogan to Irving Fryar, capping a 73-yard five-play march. Fryar had missed the Patriots' last three games because of an injured right knee.

The Raiders tied it 14-14 with 24 seconds left before halftime on a 13-yard pass from Beuerlein to Mervyn Fernandez, capping a 65-yard, seven-play march.

Grogan completed 13 of 29 passes for 17 yards with three interceptions. Beuerlein was 15-of-25 for 169 yards with no interceptions.

John Stephens, the Patriots' leading rusher, was held to 6 yards on eight carries. The Raiders' Bo Jackson led all rushers in the game with 64 yards on 2 carries.

The game was played before a crowd of 38,747 at the Los Angeles Coliseum.

Minutewomen drop season opener, 72-69

Freeman nets 18, Serafini adds 16 for UMass

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

Before the season started, head coach Kathy Hewelt knew that the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team was both a veteran squad and a young squad.

And on Saturday, the Minutewomen showed both facets of the team in a 72-69 loss to the University of Vermont in the season opener.

Veterans like center Helen Freeman (18 points, 14 rebounds) and forward Sue Serafini (16 points, two three-pointers) pitched in stellar performances, while the freshmen played er . . . like freshmen.

Each of the starting five was forced to play at least 30 minutes while the youth off the bench didn't come through like Hewelt had expected.

"We shouldn't have to play our first team 30-35 minutes," Hewelt said. "We had some freshmen who made some mistakes early and we couldn't afford to keep them in there."

The Minutewomen managed to post up big leads at times, but the Catamounts were always close enough to pull right back into the game.

UMass raced out to a 17-2 lead to open the game, then UVM stormed back with 14 points of their own. After a two-point lead at halftime, the Minutewomen built a lead as big as 11, then the Catamounts hit two three-pointers to cut that lead as well.

Down the stretch, UMass had its share of opportunities in the final minute to tie or win the ballgame but the execution wasn't there, largely due to the lack of rest.

With 18 seconds left, Freeman missed two key ones from the charity stripe that could have tied the game, and the Minutewomen got another break as the rebound off the second free throw went off a Vermont player.

With time running down and another chance to tie, the Minutewomen once again blew it, as a turnover from a bad pass led to another Vermont point.

Freshman Jenny Moran's last-second, three-point attempt fell short, and left UMass on the losing end by three.

Vermont was able to dig themselves out of double-digit deficits with a good pressure defense, aimed particularly at UMass point guard Michele Pytko.

"[Vermont] came at us with a lot of pressure, which we knew we were going to see," Hewelt said. "Our concern was of course in the backcourt with Michele and Patty [Robak]."

Pytko, a senior, is running the team in her first year at the point after coming back from an early season-ending knee injury last year. Robak is a bullseye shooter from the perimeter who'll be called upon as the Minutewomen's shooting guard, but she's only a freshman.

Looking at the stat sheet, one would have to say UMass dominated with a good team effort, but that was limited to the starting five.

"We had good balance in terms of the scoring," Hewelt said of the first unit. "I was pleased with their defense as well, but no defense will work unless all five on the court are fresh."

Freeman was like Windex on plexiglass, as she wiped up the boards for 14 rebounds. The 6-foot-4 center also pumped in 18 from the field off 9-of-11 shooting. Her teammate in the blocks, junior Keyburn McCusker, scored nine and grabbed seven rebounds.

Hewelt said of the big duet, "Helen played a good ball game. Keyburn crashed the boards in the second half and converted on some loose balls."

The second-year coach from Indiana Tech had to be pleased with Serafini's performance. The club's co-captain along with McCusker, Serafini shot close to .500 from the field (7-of-15, including two from behind the three-point line) but also had seven turnovers and five personal fouls.

"Sue played exceptionally well overall," Hewelt said. "But she had some mistakes that cost us."

The backcourt of Pytko and Robak played well, with the former handing out eight assists and the latter proving that her outside shot in the preseason was not a fluke.

"Michele did reasonably well running the floor and recognizing the defense," Hewelt said. "But we need to be able to rest her and get the maximum out of her performance."

Robak had the green light in the first half, but unexpectedly was hesitant with putting the rock up in the second. Nevertheless, the freshman from Pontiac, MI finished the day with 6-of-11 shooting.

As for the other freshmen, they'll have to improve as the season progresses because the starters won't be expected to play as much as they did Saturday. And if they have to, the same result will keep on popping up — L, L, L.

Hewelt did see one big positive out of the loss that might be an indicator for the rest of the season. "We didn't get the win but the things we did, we didn't see all of last year."

The best and the worst of football campaign

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

It began early in September at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium and ended 10 weeks later in the same place. It rolled through seven different states, with most of the miles logged in the back seat of a rented Ford Econoliner van.

When you view every single game of a season, sometimes some little things pop out at you, things that the casual, occasional fan would miss. For that, we bring to you the Collegian football awards, debated carefully by a staff of one, hermetically sealed in plain white envelopes since the end of the New Hampshire game, kept by the renowned firm of Price-Waterhouse, and now we'll also end this run-on sentence.

Best Play: Jerome Bledsoe's halfback option pass to Mike Tobin at Connecticut. Tobin was halfway back to Amherst before anyone from UConn realized what was going on.

Worst Play: The fumble-rooski by James Madison's Chris Schellhammer was a close second, only because he gained yardage on the play, but ran about as fast as the Continental Drift in doing so. Therefore, it was beaten at the buzzer by UMass guard Phil Hallard's reception for minus-six yards against Delaware.

Best Game: The New Hampshire win. Coming from behind in the second half, the Minutemen never folded the tents and sent the playoff hopes of the Wildcats packing.

Worst Game: The loss at Boston University, 41-19. No more need be said about this one. Simply brutal.

Best Quote: UMass coach Jim Reid, upon learning of the latest of bizarre injuries to his quarterback, Gary Wilkos: "I sent him to the doctor to get his groin checked, and he came back with a cast on his wrist."

Worst Quote: The same sportswriter (who wishes to remain anonymous) who boldly asked the entire press box at Villanova, "Has Northeastern won since they last won?" topped that beauty later that night with this one: "I'll have a Philly Cheese Steak — hold the cheese."

Best Band: Be real . . .

Worst Rendition of the Star-Spangled Banner: The stats crew at Lehigh, which takes it upon themselves to hit the sour notes for everyone in the press box.

Best Press Box: UMass, but this wasn't really a contest, because every other one was nominated for . . .

Worst Press Box: Lehigh — too cramped. Maine — plenty of food for the VIPs. BU — terrible stats. UConn — takes it upon themselves to throw away a writer's personal belongings while he's in the locker room getting quotes. Northeastern — it's a lean-to, basically. Calling it a press box would be libelous. Villanova — perfect if cold cement and broken tile are your thing.

Best Stadium: UMass again. With the exception of Lehigh, it is the only one that is really a "stadium." And any place with an AstroConcrete playing surface was automatically disqualified.

Worst Stadium/Facility: Northeastern. Seriously, there are better high school fields in Massachusetts than this place. As an added bonus, it's AstroConcrete field only knocked about five players out of the game, most of whom were lost for the season.

Best Bar: Touche, in the the Valley Forge Hilton. Mixed drinks till you drop for three bucks, social opportunities galore, a definite wild place. Probably the real reason George Washington slept here.

Ugliest Town: Bethlehem, Pa. Lots of tradition with those steel mills, but not a pretty sight.

Most Remote Town: Orono, Maine. Drive for about six hours and you'll suddenly come to Bangor, which seems like it just dropped out of a plane into the middle of nowhere. Orono is right next door. A hell road trip if there ever was one.

Most Enthusiastic Radio Crew: The guys from WMUA who covered the UConn game. Never would have believed a 5-yard dive off tackle could be so exciting. At least they kept the UConn writers awake.

Best Fans: The Comeau family, which at the UNH game was in attendance for the 100th straight time dating back to son Todd's freshman year in 1981. As dedicated as they come, and that doesn't even include baseball season.

Worst Fans: Everyone else for UMass. Actually, that should be everyone that never goes to the games. The crowds from the last three games combined wouldn't have filled the stadium. A sad state of affairs.

Sports at a Glance

The winter sports season kicks into full swing this week, with a host of teams in action.

The men's basketball team opens its regular season tomorrow night when the Minutemen host the University of Lowell at Curry Hicks Cage. The women's indoor track team also opens tomorrow, tarveling to the First Chance Meet at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H.

Wednesday, the women's basketball team travels to Boston University, while the men's swim team faces Tufts in its home opener at Boyden Pool.

Questions raised over research policy

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Last night during an open forum, about 20 members of the University of Massachusetts community voiced their concerns and questions regarding research funding at UMass.

The forum, which included a four-member panel representing the Ad-Hoc Faculty Senate Committeee on Research Issues, allowed participants to propose changes regarding the University's policy surrounding Department of Defense research funding at UMass. These changes will be presented in a report to the entire Committee later in the semester.

Bob Ackerman, UMass philosophy professor and chairman of the panel said, "We want to know what's out there before we make recommendations to the committee."

Jonathan Leavitt, a student who has been researching D.O.D. research at UMass for two years, recommended the committee look at defense funding from a moral and economic angle, as well as the bureaucratic aspect which classifies some research as off-limits for public inquiry.

"'Since we are not sure we can trust administration and faculty to reveal what they are working on, we want to have the ability to interpret what they are really doing," Leavitt said.

Dr. Ira Helfan, member of Physicians for Social Responsibility, questioned the validity of the University's policy regarding defense research.

"Research contributing to oppression, ill health or mass destruction is not appropriate," Helfan said. "Anthrax research is clearly related to weapons of mass destruction. We as a society need to stop this production."

Undergraduate student Robin Burghese put a question to the panel in regards to the future University defense research policy.

I'M POUTING IN THE RAIN — A child peeks out of her raincoat during a wet spell last week.

After 15 years, feds find Amherst College paintings

AMHERST, Mass. (AP) — It took nearly 15 years, but federal officials have recovered two paintings valued at more than $400,000 that were stolen from a museum at Amherst College.

Douglas C. Wilson, secretary for public affairs at the college, said the college was considering buying back the paintings from the insurance company that had reimbursed the college for its loss.

But he said Friday that no decision had been made by college officials on the repurchase. Wilson also said he did not know how much the college had been paid by its insurer.

One of the paintings, titled "The Interior of the Church in Delft," by 17th century Dutch artist Van der Vliet, was valued at $250,000 when it was recovered by federal officials in January, according to Byron G. Cudmore, first assistant to the U.S. attorney for the Central District in Illinois.

The other painting, "St. John the Baptist", painted by Flemish artist Pieter Lastman in 1616, was valued at $160,000, Cudmore said.

The paintings had been among three stolen from the Mead Art Museum at the college in February 1975. An oriental rug was also taken in the heist, which was never solved, according to Amherst Police Sgt. Timothy Sullivan.

Cudmore said the paintings were shipped from Kentucky to two undercover federal agents in Illinois in January by Myles J. Connor Jr., a 43-year-old Milton native, allegedly to secure a line of credit for a drug deal.

Vigil held to remember gay activist

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff
and LAUREN McDADE
Collegian Correspondent

About 30 people attended a candlelight vigil last night on the steps of the Student Union in memory of Harvey Milk, the openly gay San Francisco City Councillor who was shot on November 27, 1978.

Brad Robinson from the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns read excerpts from a speech by Milk addressing the need to "end the conspiracy of silence."

"There will be no safe 'closet' for any gay person. So break out of yours today," Robinson read from the speech.

Milk was assassinated by former San Francisco City Councillor Dan White, who was sentenced to five years in jail for the shooting, and released on probation three years later. He committed suicide two years later.

Following the vigil, Angela Bowen, editor of Black/Out and co-chair of the National Coalition of Black Lesbians and Gays said Harvey Milk epitomized "living out."

"He is a symbol of sacrifice for gay, lesbian and bisexual rights, just as Jesus was for religous rights," she said.

Speaking in the Student Union Ballroom at the first Harvey Milk Memorial Lecture, Bowen said it is important for members of the gay community not only to come out, but come out in every aspect of their lives or "live out."

She said the only way the gay community can live their lives legitimately is by confronting homophobia directly.

Bowen said the gay community needs to get involved in society and make its presence known in all parts of the media in order to break down homophobia.

"The more we come out, the easier it becomes," she said. "When we stay out of the closet, we take control of our own lives and help others come out as well."

She said the earlier in life someone comes out of the closet, the easier the process will be.

"The further you get in life, the more of a structure builds around you and it

Three cleared of sedition after year-long trial

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A federal jury yesterday cleared three people of charges they tried to overthrow the government by force, and responded to a judge's urging to try to reach agreement on remaining racketeering complaints by going home for the day.

The partial verdict on the 19th day of deliberations in the year-old trial was an unusual response that indicated jurors weren't impressed by the seditious conspiracy charges, which date back to prosecution of Confederate loyalists in the Civil War era, a law professor said.

"I think the government was really over-reaching frankly," said Arthur Wolf, professor at Western New England College of Law.

Prosecutors alleged the defendants were members of a dangerous terrorist band that plotted a string of bombings and bank robberies along the East Coast from 1976 to 1984 in a conspiracy to topple the U.S. government.

The two male defendants, Raymond Levasseur and Richard Williams, are already serving lengthy terms for convictions in connection with some of the bombings. Patricia Levasseur is free on bail after serving 3½ years of a 5-year term for harboring a fugitive, her husband.

In addition to the three acquittals on seditious conspiracy, the partial verdict also cleared Mrs. Levasseur of racketeering. Yet to be decided are charges of racketeering against the two men and charges of racketeering conspiracy against all three. Each count carries a maximum penalty of 20 years and $20,000 in fines.

If said the jury may have had trouble accepting the prosecution's argument that the little-known defendants posed serious threat to the government. Many of the bombings were conducted at night and some devices did not explode. An April 1976 bombing at the Suffolk County Courthouse in April 1976 left one man with his leg severed below the knee.

"I can't help believing that when you're talking about seditious conspiracy that the jurors would take into account in some respect the inability to carry out the plan," Wolf said.

Defense attorneys hailed the partial verdict as vindication of their argument the charges never should have been lodged.

"The fact is that conspiracy to overthrow the government by violence is a ridiculous charge. The government had no right to use it," said Elizabeth Fink, one of a team of a half-dozen attorneys who have represented the trio.

Mrs. Levasseur said she was pleased by the partial verdict.

"You always worry," she said. "These are very broad statutes. People get convicted of these charges without ever leaving home."

U.S. District judge William Young urged jurors to try and reach a complete verdict, but the jury promptly responded with the announcement it was taking the afternoon off and would resume Tuesday.

Students raise money to rebuild Israeli forest

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Yesterday was the kickoff of a week-long tree planting drive sponsored by a student group that [illegible] to eventually raise enough mon 3-01 [illegible]t 1,000 trees in efforts to rebuild forests in Israel.

The Student Alliance for Israel will have a table on the Campus Center Concourse for the remainder of this week. Five dollars will buy a tree to be planted in Israel by the Jewish National Fund, an international agency responsible for afforestation and land reclamation in Israel.

"The Student Alliance for Israel has decided that we can sit still no longer, we must take action to rebuild this part of Israel's beauty," said Aaron Silverman, a member.

The alliance wants to replace in the forests a vitality which was lost during the fires. "Trees in Israel have been a symbol of vitality in the land. To burn trees is to kill the vitality of the land," Silverman said.

The money donated at the University of Massachusetts will be used to restore the forest in Mt. Carmel, a range near Haifa. In a mid-September blaze, more than 1,200 acres of the 20,000 acre forest were burned in a fire set in five different locations which lasted for 30 hours.

The fire, which caused thousands of trees and many animals to perish, was said by the JNF to be an act of arson.

Although the JNF has planted more than 195 million trees in Israel since 1901, it has suffered a setback due to fires throughout Israeli forests since the Palestinian uprising beginning in 1987. JNF says because of "a new form of terrorism, arson, over 2 million trees planted by the Jewish people through JNF have succumbed to the flames of destruction."

Five Roebuck deer, a European species, that were given to Israel last year by Queen Beatrix, the monarch of Holland, were among the wildlife to die in the fire.

The JNF said that the Israeli police have arrested six Arabs on suspicion of igniting the fires.

Godi Karmi, a UMass graduate student and member of the alliance said, "A tree is innocent. Hurting a tree is one way for destruction. The best answer to that is to go back and replant."

Karmi, an Israeli citizen, said that the link between American Jews and Israel goes both ways. "This is one way for American Jews to contribute."

He added that several of his non-Jewish friends had donated money to plant trees in his homeland. "Giving [money] to trees is something that goes beyond religion and geographical borders."

1,000 trees, a goal the group hopes to reach by early next semester, is special because together they form a grove, for which the JNF promised an accompanying listing of all contributors names, Karmi said.

Trees can be purchased to honor or remember somebody. The buyer will receive a picture postcard as a certificate of purchase. For two dollars, a poster marking the drive at UMass can also be bought.

The money collected at UMass will be passed on to the Boston branch of JNF, Karmi said. After this week anyone wishing to buy a tree can do so in the Hillel office.

Shuttle lands safely after 5-day secret military mission

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) — Space shuttle Discovery streaked out of orbit and landed safely today at the end of a secret military mission extended an extra day and then an extra orbit by high winds at this desert air base.

Air Force Col. Frederick Gregory, commander of the five-person crew, guided the winged spaceplane to a touchdown on a concrete runway at 7:30 p.m. EST after a five-day flight that covered nearly two million miles.

"Commander Gregory reports wheels stop," said Billie Deason, the Mission Control commentator.

Two sonic booms cracked overhead as Columbia descended through a clear sky and made its sweeping approach to runway 04. Forty-five minutes before touchdown, controllers directed Gregory to shift to 04 from hard clay runway 17 because of more favorable winds.

The rays of the setting sun shone brilliantly off the shuttle as it made its final approach to a centerline touchdown.

The shuttle landed in light crosswinds of 5 mph and a headwind of about 17 mph.

Mission Control lifted its curtain of silence on the flight to report 80 minutes before landing that Greagory had successfully fired two braking rockets to drop the shuttle out of orbit and start it on a fiery plunge through the atmosphere.

"The propulsion officer and the crew confirm that the burn was good," control center commentator Billie Deason reported after the 3 minute 4 second rocket ignition.

The five-day flight reportedly put in orbit a satellite to monitor military communications over a wide area of the globe.

Although as many as half a million people have flocked to this desert air base to watch previous shuttles land, yesterday's touchdown was closed to the public because the mission was classified.

Winds gusting to 30 mph forced NASA to call off a landing attempt here on Sunday. The winds were not as strong yesterday, but were high enough at times at more than 15 mph to make conditions unacceptable for a planned landing at 2:52 p.m.

With prospects looking better for the follow-on orbit, controllers directed the astronauts to stay aloft another 89 minutes. As predicted, the winds subsided and NASA gave the astronauts the go-ahead to fire the braking rockets.

Statehouse close to passing weapons ban

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts House and Senate both gave all but final approval yesterday to a limited ban on assault weapons in the City of Boston.

The legislation would ban the sale of nine types of semiautomatic weapons in Boston and require any owners of the weapons to register with the police commissioner. It has been viewed as a major setback to the gun rights lobby.

The bill is a home rule petition already approved by the City Council.

Yesterday's vote was on approval of a conference committee report reconciling differences between the House and Senate versions.

The measure was amended in the Senate to prevent the city from adding any weapons to the list without first seeking the Legislature's approval.

But that amendment was vigorously opposed by the bill's backers, who said updating the list was necessary to keep up with gang members' evolving arsenals, and it did not withstand conference committee debate.

Both chambers must take one more routine vote to send the legislation to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who has said he will sign it into law.

Rep. Jim Brett (D-Boston) said he expected the House to enact the measure Tuesday with little further debate.

Michael Yacino, executive director of the Gun Owners' Action League, attributed the bill's passage to the fact that it was one city's request, even though it will affect people just passing through Boston.

Debate in the earlier stages of the legislation pitted gun owners against those who say violence on the city's streets calls for restrictions on weapons.

The bill faced particularly tough opposition in the Senate, where several amendments designed to cut the measure had to be beaten back.

becomes harder and harder to break that structure," she said.

Bowen said another way for the gay community to legitimize their lives is by taking themselves seriously and documenting their history.

She said she is optimistic about the Gay Civil Rights bill that was signed into law two weeks ago, but said she hopes that the efforts of the gay community don't die out because of the one victory.

"It's important to push our boundaries, there's so much stuff to be done out there," she said.

She said the gay community should get involved with other causes and create an overlapping effect so all minorities can work together as a rallying force.

"We want to know [from the Ad Hoc Committee] is D.O.D. okay? If not, why not?" Burghese said. "We'd like to know before we continue our research."

Ackerman responded to some of the concerns of the members of the forum. "Speaking for myself, I think some change for defense is necessary," Ackerman said. "We have to see what is workable."

Despite the low turnout, the panel denied accusations that the forum was organized with "malicious intent."

Sue Gordon, Board of Governors representative to the panel, said she felt the panel was a success despite the small participation.

"I hope people walked away with the idea that this accomplished something," Gordon said. "Although I feel that the students' voices on the committee are not being heard now, I'm hoping to get somewhere and eventually bring in the real issues."

Connor pleaded guilty last week in Illinois to two counts of interstate transportation of stolen property in connection with the paintings and conspiracy to distribute cocaine. He is being held in Springfield, Ill., awaiting sentencing, according to Cudmore.

Judd J. Carhart, district attorney for Hampshire and Franklin counties, said he had no plans to seek Connor's extradition and and Cudmore said that no federal charges in connection with the actual theft of the paintings or their removal from Massachusetts have been filed.

Cudmore said federal officials have no evidence to indicate who stole the paintings from the college or how they were brought to Kentucky.

The wave of change

June, 1989
BEIJING – Thousands of people have flooded Tiananmen Square for several days, feverishly demanding democracy and the dismantling of the Communist regime that has ruled China with an iron fist. Reacting to the massive protest and condemnation of the Chinese government, Communist Party leaders ordered troops to crush the rebellion. Thousands were killed and injured in what many world leaders described as blatant, merciless brutality.

September, 1989
WARSAW – After several days of protest and demand for a democratic government, Poland's hardline Communist party relinquished its control over the government to the popular Solidarity party headed by Lech Walesa.

This party had recently been outlawed by the Communist party.

October, 1989
LIEPZIG, East Germany – Massive protests against the newly elected Communist leader Egon Krer coupled with the exodus of hundreds of thousands of East Germans to the West, dampened the German Democratic Republic's 40th anniversary celebrations.

November, 1989
EAST BERLIN – After nearly 40 years, the Berlin Wall, which stood as a barrier preventing travel from East Germany to West Germany, was brought down. Thousands of jubilant East and West German citizens danced and celebrated on top of the wall, as many chipped away at this once symbol of oppression.

November, 1989
BONN, West Germany – In an effort to compromise with the popularly-supported opposition parties, the East German government agreed on unprecedented talks to plan free, democratic elections.

November, 1989
BUDAPEST, Hungary – With the tide of reform crashing all over Eastern Europe, elections were held in Hungary to determine when and how the president will be chosen, breaking nearly 40 years of Communist party rule.

November, 1989
PRAGUE, Czechoslovakia – A general pro-democracy strike following on the heels of several days of massive protest and police violence, boasted nearly a half million participants as it shut down the country for almost two hours. Attempting to calm the protests, the Communist Party's Central Committee dumped three more hardliners, leaving three original members in the committee.

What can I say? What can any of us here in the United States say? In a mere six months, the face of the world has changed radically, dramatically, and emotionally.

This change is far more than we can fathom.

People all over the world are breaking free from the chains that bind them. They are coming out, speaking their minds, demanding their freedom and their autonomy. They are willing to die for these ideals. Thousands already have.

We sit here, thousands of miles away, content in our freedom to rally and protest – without the fear of death. We can write to and in newspapers and be free to criticize our government, and for that matter, most anything or anyone we want to criticize.

To comprehend the intense emotion running rampant in Eastern Europe and China, may be beyond many of us.

This furious pace of change is beyond words. The emotion can only be seen in the faces of these brave people who are willing to truly fight for what they believe in.

Change possible from within

People in this country never cease to amaze me. Have they never heard the proverb – as you make your bed, so you must lie on it?

Nathan Krystall

After George Bush had clearly told the citizens of the United States that he is opposed to women's rights to an abortion, they elected him to be their president. A year later, people seem to be surprised that Roe v. Wade is in the process of being overturned.

Similarly, UMass students scream and yell about sexism and racism at the Collegian. Some may say that I'm blaming the victim, but if you find the Collegian oppressive, you've got to realize the part you play in your own oppression.

In case you don't know, the Collegian is a student newspaper, run by students. Unlike Bush, you don't have to get elected to work at the Collegian. There are no requirements and no commitments. You can write one story or a hundred stories.

Almost a generation ago, students acted on their feelings that the Collegian was helping to oppress them. They took over its offices, and demanded structural changes. The results were desks and pages for both Women's Issues and Black Affairs. We've successfully let those 70s activists down. Both those desks are seriously understaffed, not to mention other desks at the Collegian. A handful of reporters write the overwhelming majority of the Collegian's news stories, whether they are covering Women's Issues, Black Affairs, or any other community news.

The perennial charges of racism, sexism and other 'isms ring stale in the ears of overworked Collegian staffers. A more pertinent question is, "Who is going to change the Collegian?" If it isn't students who expect fair and accurate reporting of as wide a spectrum of campus issues as possible, then I guess we'd better sit back and wait for Santa Claus.

Another famous allegation: "The Collegian's environment is too hostile for me to work down there." Firstly, if you live in this society, you encounter racism and sexism every day. It's not a problem unique to the Collegian.

Secondly, anyone who wants to change an institution will encounter a hostile reaction. But at the Collegian, the turnover rate of students is so high that this reaction is caused more by institutional tradition than by the staff members.

Contrary to popular belief, the Collegian is not a monolith. If you, or better yet, you and a friend, want to have a positive impact on the Collegian, you'd be surprised at how easily that can be accomplished, with some perseverance, of course.

Obviously, societal and institutional pressures, including of course the media, weigh heavily on the side of a given system's reactionaries, and against those advocating its change. That's one reason that Jesse Jackson, a man who represented freedom of choice for the individual, including women, was defeated in the 1988 presidential election.

I would like to think that everyone who squirms when they see Bush and the Supreme Court systematically limiting women's rights fought like hell against his election. I would also like to think that students who complain about the Collegian do something to change it. But I know better.

Is it a characteristic American trait to sit and watch other people oppress them and then, after the fact, turn to one another and say, "Gee, I guess we're getting screwed." I refuse to accept that it is.

A major step in overcoming oppression is to recognize how you abet it. Put the Collegian on your side, don't let it work against you.

When are Americans going to get the rusty nails out of their proverbial bed, so they don't scream when they lie on them? For all of our sakes, it had better be soon.

Nathan Krystall is a Collegian staff member.

Taxes: Far from an intellectual solution

To all intellects in support of a tax hike:

Let me use some reasoning, if I may, who will these taxes affect? The rich, right? The stockholders, right? And let us not forget our major corporations. What a concept!

Punish the rich and successful so that we can get a better education. In turn, we will all use this upgraded education to become rich and successful ourselves. Therefore, we are taxing the very people who, by fighting for higher education, we strive to become.

Taxes hurt everyone no matter what their income. To say that the rich can afford taxes is just as silly as making the generalization that all poor people are lazy.

Why punish the majority of the rich who have worked their butts off to get where they are and deserve to reap the benefits of their hard work?

I'm not saying that the poor should be stripped bare. Nobody should be taxed, especially to make up for the faulty planning of our government led by King Dukakis.

Wouldn't you rather rally to fight unnecessary spending in the government and in the University itself?

A blast from the 'past?'

"Bear with me, this will become relevant"
—David R. Mark, calming the perplexed Editorial desk.

David R. Mark

David's latest phobia is aging

I'm feeling old.

You say, "You jerk, you're only 21." I agree, but after a series of unrelated incidents this past week, I in fact am feeling old.

I was looking in my closet for a book when I happened upon Baseball Stars, 1982. The book, complete with 175 photos, cost me about $2.95 when I bought it at the Paradise Bookshop in Naperville, Ill., in the spring of 1982.

It was only seven years ago, but looking through the pages at the various teams' starting lineups in 1982, I soon began to feel old.

It seemed that 90 percent of the players had retired. Players like Red Sox first baseman Dave Stapleton, Minnesota Twins Starting Pitcher Pete Redfern, Atlanta Braves shortstop Rufino Linares, St. Louis relief ace John R. Martin, White Sox catcher Bill Nahorodny, and Cubs third basemen (and phenom) Ty Waller.

What was worse was seeing the phrase "up-n-coming" to describe a player who in 1989 was considered a "veteran."

Radio leads to additional worry

Driving home from New Jersey I listened to America's Top 40. (Casey Kasem no longer does the show. Now it's Shadoe Stevens.) During the countdown, they "whisked back" to 1983, playing a few seconds of the Top 5, this week six years ago.

The songs were, by the way: No. 5, "Cum On, Feel the Noise," by Quiet Riot; No. 4, "Islands in the Stream," by Dolly Parton and Kenny Rogers; No. 3, "Uptown Girl," by Billy Joel; No. 2, "Say, Say, Say," by Michael Jackson and Paul McCartney, and at No. 1, "All Night Long," by Lionel Richie.

Whatever happened to Quiet Riot? I know, most of you don't care. But you all know the song. How many of you could remember the name of the group?

Gadzooks – we're all getting old.

Party adds to fear

At a party Saturday night (a friend of mine turned 21), I saw my friend's sister for the first time in three years. She's 18 now, and doesn't look anything like she did when she was 15.

With makeup, a flattering outfit and a hair-do to match, my friend's sister was a person not to be patted on the head and shooed away, but to be scared of touching – like the feeling one gets when looking at a teen-age television star.

And my friends, her friends and I were talking about career moves, graduate schools, vacation spots, etc., instead of the stuff we used to talk about way back when – movies, food, and whether we'd ever get a chance to use our driver's licenses.

The relevant part

Here comes the relevant part)

Of course, getting older has its advantages.

How many of you can remember the title of a major paper you did in high school? Or the subject matter of a test you sweated over? How many of you can remember spending hours on end worrying, panicking, studying, perhaps crying, because of an assignment you thought would break you?

If you can't remember, no problem. You're in good company.

Keep that in mind as you spend the next three weeks worrying, panicking, studying, perhaps crying, because of assignments you think will break you. You won't remember anything about the assignments years from now, so don't let them bother you so much. Just try the best you can and hope for the best.

Just some advice from a person who is feeling older . . . and maybe a little wiser. (Though don't count on it.)

Writing about a book about writers, and writing right (?)

By WILLIAM J. GEORGIADES
Collegian Staff

On Being a Writer
Bill Strickland -Ed.
Writers Digest Books

"A Look at 'On Being a Writer'— the pros give hints for a succesful writing career." So went the "Tommorow" box on page one of yesterday's Collegian. Personally, I regret the error.

This is a book about the reverence writing deserves as an art form and as a way of life. Through a number of interviews with the great and not so great of the writing world, "On Being a Writer" doesn't so much "give tips from the pros," as it does stress the impossibility of teaching writing, of sharing any secrets, techniques, or tricks of the trade. "On Being a Writer" simply allows one into the world of 31 of our greatest (with a few very notable exceptions) American contemporary writers.

At first glance such a description would, at the least, cause some negative reaction. With the advent of writing programs (in addition to endless scouring of contemporary writing) I've taken a dim view of the future for contemporary prose, poetry, drama et. al., especially in the States.

However, this collection of interviews, sandwiched between two highly appropriate essays, is more than a delight; it shows writers of substance, writers who actually have something to say, in todays world, in their element. And, surprise, surprise, a dim view is held of the writing programs "that have sprung up like triplex movie theaters,"(from Will Blythe's introduction). But this is not another rant and rave against plastic writing, rather it is a celebration of the art form, the negative comments directed solely at that which seeks, no matter how innocently, to destroy the soul of the art.

It all begins with an essay by Harlan Ellison, written 30 years ago when the writer was, in his words, a "bombastic tot." While the writing of the piece does belly the man's, at the time, 26 years (much as the Collegian belies the twentysomething and below mentality of we staffers), it does make a valuable point, in the earnest mode that campus youngsters should certainly be able to relate to. "If you spell like an aborigine and phrase like a longshoreman," he writes (with little other evidence of any racism or snobbery) "but have something to say . . . then we suffer alike . . . we want to go — where? there, alike! . . . You're a writer."

Charming stuff. The remainder of the pages are peppered with interviews culled from the past issues of Writers Digest Magazine. Short story writers, novelists, playwrights, journalists, poets and even Jay McInerney (!!!?) share their thoughts, feelings and occasional wisdoms with the reader. We go from Wlliam Faulkner to Raymond Carver, dropping in on Kurt Vonnegut, Nikki Gioanni, James Dickey, Rod McKuen and Norman Mailer, to name but a few, along the way. Some hapless hacks are also included, such as Erica Jong and James Michener, but there some advice for the disease of the potential "career writer" can be found. How else to describe it? I could allow the interview subjects to drone on, out of context, but, unfortunately, their words are too close and many between. Okay, just one, Allen Ginsberg: "[you must] express [yourself] completely without worrying what it looks like in public."

The book ends with an essay by the literary wonder John Steinbeck, written three years before his death in 1966. It is the perfect complement for a book that begins with a 26 year old's "shooting off his mouth . . . about the holy chore of writing," and continues with the shared experience of an unmatched bunch of contemporary American writers.

After 214 wonderfully produced pages of sumptuous writing on the nature of writing (including fine photographs of every writer included), Steinbeck takes the smallest amount of space to sum up 66 years of working in words, including this:

"I have written a great many stories and I still don't know how to go about it except to write it and take my chances."

"The hardest trade in the world is the writing of straight, honest prose about human beings," Papa

Also published by Writers Digest Books, and currently available, is the "1990 Writers Market." The most complete listing of potential buyers for articles, novels, plays, scripts, short stories, and greeting cards (take note, those of you who think you know who you are), the book is invaluable for the many among us who think about sending off our treasured scrawlings, and never do anything about it. Perfect for the occasional moments in life when we decide to actually send ourselves out into the world, perhaps to receive nought but the terror of a dying bird, perhaps to fly upon the wings . . . (forget it, but I did take a writing course once you know.) While the approximate $20 cost of the book is steep, copies of past years editions are also available at most places that sell second hand books, for a cheaper price, with obvious drawbacks.

And one more thing; "If you have a piece of serious writing . . .a man will desert his wife or poison his grandmother, if need be, to get it told," from William Faulkner.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): A sound insurance policy will help you achieve your financial ends. Be sure you are covered for every contingency. A home improvement project should increase the value of your property.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): New financial progress reduces the tensions that have caused problems ast home. A salary increase or promotion is likely. Invest wisely. Let a romantic relationship develop at its own pace.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Trust your hunches. Travel brings fresh perspectives and important business contacts. Keep receipts so your expense account wil not be questioned. Give romance a second chance.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Athletic activities keep your body toned. Brisk walks also clear the cobwebs from your brain. Showcase your untapped leadership skills. A need for love leads you to reach out to others.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Refuse to make or accept an unreasonable pledge. To stay healthy, avoid all forms of excess. You find a special serenity just being around loved ones. Keep all dental and medical appointments.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): A neighbor or business associate may disrupt your family plans. Someone you thought you knew well now appears in a different light. Spending some quiet time alone restores your equilibrium.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): When it comes to your home and possessions, you have a new incentive to make improvements. Do not shortchange those closest to you heart. Window-shopping proves both fun and inexpensive.

SCORPIO(Oct.23-Nov.21): Reserve some time to answer the correspondence you have received recently. Write exactly what you mean. Handle an older person with kid gloves; your patience will be rewarded.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Go over your personal finances. You need to know exactly where you stand. Do not let others tell you how to live your life. Be honest if your romantic partner asks you ticklish questions.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan. 19): Someone wants a special favor involving money. A new beginning could prove profitable. Financial pressures will be relieved when someone pays a debt. Self-improvement projects boost your ego.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Catch up on your correspondence and get your financial affairs in better order. A close alliance is a source of great satisfaction. Seek advice from an older friend or admirer.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): Somebody's honesty could take your breath away. You are both surprised and pleased! Make a list before going shopping to save valuable time. Think twice before OKing travel plans. Family life beckons.

And the winner of album of the decade is . . .

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Well, it's the end of the decade.

It's that time when you buy all those fun tabloids that tell you all the way cool people and trends of the last ten years.

I'm a junkie for this stuff. I can spend more than a week's pay buying up all the *People*s, *Rolling Stone*s, Us', *Premiere*s and Times that mention "Best of ... " anything on their cover, even if Ronald Reagan's face is there. I've spent the last month or so blowing off papers, exams and any type of social life so that I could read the Rolling Stone albums of the decade issue. Pretty pathetic, huh?

I've already given you my highly pretentious choices for movie of the decade (and keep sending your choices in), now I intend to give you my even more obnoxious choices for album of the decade.

Any of you that read any of my stuff on a fairly regular basis (Thanks to both of you), know that I have a certain attraction to the latest wave of folk that's come around. Yes, a lot of it is nothing more than an outlet for Yuppies to relieve their guilt. ("I'm socially aware. I listen to Tracy Chapman.") But there's more to it than that. In an age when everything, including music, has become cold, electronic and impersonal, folk artists have brought that personal touch back into our bustled lives.

But the list includes very little folk. What it contains is a musical potpourri of artists that have shaped the music of our past decade.

Case in point. Culture Club's Kissing to Be Clever deserves a place on my list. The lovable Boy George brought his soulful voice and infectious melodies to millions, and Kissing helped define the pop sound of the 80s.

Prince's 1999, (not the overblown Purple Rain) is classic Prince. Raunchy, funky dance music with a hook. Without him, we'd still be spelling "U," "Y-O-U." It deserves a number nine ranking.

London Calling, by the Clash does deserve a mention. It was Joe Strummer and Mick Jones in their prime. It's mean, nasty, satirical and funny.

REM's Murmur is number seven. They brought human quality, humor and mumbling back into music. It's just too bad that every other band that comes out of Georgia tries to sound like them.

ART ATTACK

Strutting in at number six is Madonna for True Blue. This woman helped shape the 80s in dress, style and music. She knows how to package herself. She's the Marilyn Monroe of our day, and you can dance to her tunes.

Now here comes some folk. Enter Tracy Chapman. Her solo, self-titled debut is perfect. She's not afraid to tell things like they are, and she doesn't need a lot of electronic noise to do it.

Paul Simon kind of whimped out on his Graceland album. His songs could have been much more concerned with the Apartheid issue, but maybe not as many people would have bought it. As it is, he opened up the wonderful world of African music to many of us, including myself, who were totally ignorant to it. And he also won points with me for "You Can Call Me Al."

Scratching in at number three, and would probably be even higher if I liked rap at all, is Run-DMC. Rap is the only original music of our decade. It's the punk of the 80s. It's real, it's fresh, and it was brought to the masses by Run-DMC.

His friends, basketball mates and band members call him "Night Train Clemons," but his name is Robert Cray. The man who brought blues back, and did it with a passion, deserves being number two for Strong Persuader. Okay, his lyrics are sexist, but this is the blues.

Now, here's where everyone is going to get pissed off at me. Maybe I'm just doing this out of spite because I noticed this album is conspicuously absent from the Rolling Stone Top 100. I actually like her first album better, but it just didn't have the impact of her follow-up. But this is the woman who set the stage for Tracy Chapman, Michelle Shocked, Rickie Lee Jones' comeback and a slew of others. Her album is emotional, warm and human. Her lyrics are poetic. She is Suzanne Vega, and her album is Solitude Standing, the best album of the 1980s.

Guns 'n' Roses' Appetite for Destruction was originally on this list because they are a throwback to what rock originally was — rebel music that adults hate. But Axl Rose is too much of a racist, sexist scumbag and the band is just not creative enough to earn a top ten spot. U2, Michael Jackson and Bruce Springsteen were all purposefully left off. Springsteen, whose bleak Born in the USA has been misinterpreted by everyone as a pro-American album, has become a parody of himself. The formally brilliant street smart poet has become a jingoistic caricature.

Jackson makes more news with his antics than his repetitive (dare I say) disco tunes. He's one of the top ten dancers and video performers of the decade, but his albums don't cut it.

U2 is band I don't really have an excuse for, except that the albums that made them huge, Joshua Tree and Unforgettable Fire, are their worst albums. Their best album, October, is one that Bono and the boys don't even like. But the band is almost solely responsible for bringing the new Irish sound (Hothouse Flowers, Waterboys, Sinead O'Connor, etc.) to the United States. Maybe if Bono stops thinking he's God and cracks a joke once in awhile, the band will be able to recapture the spirit of their youth, and make it on a list for the best albums of the 90s.

At this point, many of you are probably wishing my death. I apologize for my lack of heavy metal, and the list is sickeningly mainstream. My ego isn't quite big enough (yet) to assume that my list is the ultimate list. Therefore, send in your favorite top ten albums of the decade and we will print a bunch of them in next week's Collegian. Make sure to include your name and phone number, and send them to Albums of the Decade, Collegian Arts Dept., 113 Campus Center, Amherst MA 01003.

Clapton regains his God status

By DANA L. FORRAR
Collegian Correspondent

Journeyman
Eric Clapton
Warner Bros.

The old adage that "Clapton is God" still rings true. Eric Claptons' newest release, Journeyman, is the culmination of his work in the 80s and is worthy of any music lovers ear.

RECORD REVIEW

With the help of some old friends such as George Harrison, Robert Cray and Phil Collins, as well as new ones like Daryl Hall and sax virtuoso David Sanborn, Clapton extends his voice to new heights and plays a mean guitar per usual that produces his best effort in his sober years. Under new producer, Russ Titelman, his sound is meatier and more blues based than his recent efforts.

Eric has returned to his roots in blues, something he was led astray from while Phil Collins produced his work. His songs are less commercial with more feeling that mix with his experimentation of synthesizers, and an even more recent addition of the saxophone. Clapton's work on the two Lethal Weapon soundtracks has teamed him up with David Sanborn on saxophone, a duo that more will be seen of in the future.

Robert Cray is also a large contributor to the album, playing on four of the twelve songs. He and Clapton extend each other much like the dual between Eric Clapton and Jack Bruce of Cream in the late sixties. For example, the song "Old Love" is a case of the two alternating solos. Eric displays his versatility by doing covers of Ray Charles' "Hard Times" and Elvis' "Hound Dog," both with a jazzier tone that still fits the mood of the song.

Clapton's backing comes from the familiar duo of Nathan East on bass and Greg Phillinganes on keyboards and piano, who together set the best possible background conducive to Eric's abilities, as well as shine on their own. The only disappointment is that which plagues all of his solo work: the unoriginal and undaring drum sequences which follow Clapton's guitar.

However, save this shortcoming in another instrument in the band, Clapton's guitar and voice make the music soar on such songs as "Running on Faith" and "Lead Me On," in which he stresses simplicity in the beautiful backing voices and acoustic guitar.

Eric Clapton has completed his most beautiful work in the 80s. His longevity, experience and dedication to his music has done himself proud on Journeyman, and anyone remotely curious should go ahead and give this one a listen.

A band in search of a band

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Are you a serious rhythm guitarist, bassist, or drummer looking for a band to play with? Would you mind moving to California? Well, if you are you may want to consider joining Plastic X. They will be having try outs soon and will be heading off to Los Angeles to record an album that will be produced by none other than Dave Mustaine, lead guitarist of the well known thrash metal group, Megadeth.

Plastic X was formed by guitarist Rob and vocalist Mike Salvini, who are brothers, in Washington, D.C. about five years ago. At first they were a hard core group, but when they moved up to the five college area with their parents, they changed their sound to that of a death/gothic rock style.

"We started with death rock and it became a big scene," Mike Salivini recalled, "That's when Northampton had a scene. But then it died out."

At this point, they also had a female keyboard player, but she didn't work out. So, once the scene died out and they kicked out their keyboard player, they tried their hand at heavy metal. They put together the line up of bassist Chris La Plante, rhythm guitarist Chris Bartlett, and drummer Jimmy Robergh.

"At first, we didn't want another guitarist," Rob Salvini said in explaining why Bartlett was added to the lineup, "but we needed a drummer and Robergh wouldn't join without Bartlett. So we figured we try it out."

It took a little while before the group found the thrash/hardcore style that they play now.

"When the death rock scene died out," Mike Salvini explained, "we started to play covers of groups like Poison. We thought we had to do that to make it."

But who knows if Plastic X will stay with their current style. With their recent lineup upheaval, anything could happen. And as Mike Salvini claimed, "Plastic X is constantly changing their style."

When asked why the group lost three of their members, Rob Salvini answered, "Although we were gaining a pretty big following, it was becoming depressing because we lacked originality. It just wasn't working out and the three members that left really didn't want to move to L.A."

So it seems that losing these members was good for the band but nevertheless unfortunate, considering that they have to scramble to find members at a high point in their career. They are in the process of sending demos to managers and record companies in hopes of receiving a contract and gaining more exposure. Two companies have already approached them, RCA and MCA, but according to the group the deals weren't good enough.

Plastic X will have their shot at more exposure on Tuesday, Dec. 12, when they play at the Channel in Boston as an opening act for the group, Icon. According to Mike Salvini, a lot is riding on this show. For now, they have put together a temporary group to play the Channel show, but they still need permanent members. So if you are seriously interested, contact the Collegian for more information.

Basketball team opens season at Cage tonight

Lowell comes to Amherst for 7 p.m. encounter with Minutemen

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

After a month and a half of going at each other, against a bunch of Swedes, and just going mad in the Cage, the University of Massachusetts men's basketaball couldn't be happier that the enemy is coming to town tonight.

"They're ready to play," UMass coach John Calipari said. "For a month and a half now, we've been beaten each other up. Now, we're going to be running against another team. And I think they're ready for that. I think they're tired of seeing each other's faces and smelling each other's breaths."

The University of Lowell is the team tonight (7 p.m., Curry Hicks Cage) that the Minutemen would like to beat up instead of themselves. And there are three things that Calipari would like to accomplish in the process.

"We're going into the game thinking execution, intensity on defense and running," Calipari said. "We want to score points, we want to get it up and down but we want to execute in our offense and we want to defend."

Lowell has already gotten all of its pre-season frustrations out of its system. The Chiefs have played two games and own an impressive 70-66 win over Merrimack College, the defending ECAC Champion.

That was ten days ago. Saturday, Lowell lost at American International College on a shot with five seconds left that gave AIC the 68-67 win. The Chiefs are no pushovers, but . . . they are a Division II ballclub.

"I don't think with where our program is right now, we don't want to start off with the North Carolinas," Calipari said. "We want to start off with somebody who we can try different things with."

Where the program is right now is in the middle of a rebuilding period. A junior, two freshmen, and two sophomores will get the call from Calipari to start tonight's game.

John Tate, the elder statesman of the bunch returns to the Cage after a year in which he led the Minutemen in rebounding with 7.61 boards a game. He also added 11 points a game for the Minutemen.

Sophomores Jim McCoy, the Atlantic 10 Freshman-of-the-Year in 1989, and Anton Brown are now seasoned veterans after starting the whole year in Calipari's first season. McCoy was forced into the forward duty when Duane Chase and David Brown were suspended from the team last year during intersession. But McCoy will return to his more natural position, the off guard spot, tonight.

Tony Barbee and the rest of the University of Massachusetts basketball team will be in action tonight at 7 p.m. when the Minutemen face Lowell at the Cage.

"I feel a lot more comfortable playing guard," McCoy said.

The switch will make the Minutemen a little less vulnerable down in the low post. Being just 6-foot-3, McCoy was overmatched in size in a lot of games last year.

"Last year I got posted up a lot because of my size," McCoy said. "This year, maybe some of the guards might be a little bit quicker than me, but I think maybe I'll be a little bit stronger since I'm used to playing against guys inside."

Calipari was able to make the switch because of two outstanding freshmen that have won spots in the starting lineup. Harper Williams, a 6-foot-7 forward from Bridgeport, Conn. should not be taken advantage of like McCoy was last year.

Another rookie joining him in the starting five will be Tony Barbee from Indianapolis, a 6-foot-6 forward who can also hit the outside shot. Freshman forward Tom Pace, from Denver, will be one of the first big men off the bench.

"Right now in practice [the freshmen] have been giving us a great effort," Calipari said. "Their concentration level at times, slips. But your going to get concentration slippage with young kids. Their not used to concentrating in practice with the intensity that we go over a period of time."

But, the freshman have started to blend in with the veterans pretty well.

"It was pretty sloppy at the beginning [of practice]," Barbee said. "Nobody really knew each other. After about a month though, the chemistry started to come together."

Lowell's chemistry hasn't been too bad either in the early stages of the season. The Chiefs have a couple of players that can really fill the basket up in Brian Parath (22 points per game) and Lean Scully (19.5). Senior center David Barry cleans up the boards for Lowell. He has grabbed 20 bounds over the Chiefs' two games.

"The last three days of practice have really picked up a bit," Calipari said. "I think as it gets closer to gametime, the kids get more excited about practicing and getting themselves ready."

Tomorrow though, they won't be practicing with all the same faces at the Cage.

Fagan sweeps to success for field hockey

Kerri Fagan was an integral part of the success enjoyed by the University of Massachusetts field hockey team this year.

By C.C. SANDORFI
Collegian Correspondent

It has been said that in sports, the best offense is a good defense.

In the case of UMass field hockey, that offense was often sparked by the play of defender Kerri Fagan, a junior who was recently named Honorable Mention Division I All-American.

Fagan, who also nabbed First Team All-Region New England honors in early November, plays in the sweeper position (between the goaltender and the halfbacks). Assistant coach Patti Bossio said Fagan was instrumental in coordinating the team's defense and getting the offense off to a good start.

"Kerri was our deepest defender," Bossio said. "She'd break up a lot of plays and then start our offense."

A native of Burrilllville, R.I., Fagan played for Southeastern Massachusetts University before transferring to UMass two and a half years ago.

She came to UMass to take on the challenge of Division I field hockey and to pursue a major in exercise science, she said. Her UMass debut came on the heels of the team's trip to the Final Four, though, and Fagan said it made the transition a little difficult.

"When I came in, it was the year after they'd gone to the Final Four," Fagan said. "They really had great memories of the season and I wasn't part of it; it made it tough for me to fit in."

But her teammates made her feel welcome, Fagan said, and she soon settled into playing center back, a position she'd held since her high school days.

Fagan spent a year in this spot. This season, however, she was asked to move to the sweeper position. Kathe Derwin, one of the co-captains, explained, "Because of a lack of personnel, we needed her to make a change [to sweeper]. She took the responsibility and became very good at the position."

Fagan admits she was skeptical to start. "At first I didn't like [the position], but now I like it a lot. As a sweeper, you always have to play in control. I had a hard time at that this year . . . at the beginning of the year, I was panicking. Now, I'm a lot more poised," Fagan said.

Bossio said Fagan put in a lot of effort adjusting to her new role as sweeper. "Kerri had to work at it," Bossio said. "Sometimes she got unsettled, but she become more calm. It just took a little adjusting."

Derwin praised Fagan's abilities in what she called "a very difficult position."

"She's a very good defensive player with excellent skills," Derwin said. "She sets the defensive tempo and keeps people organized. She sets a positive attitude to playing defense."

Fagan has come to enjoy her new role, she said. "I can honestly say I like sweeper better [than center back]. You can see everything and kind of take control."

Bossio said Fagan is an asset to the team in other ways, too.

"Kerri is the type of kid any coach would want on a team," Bossio said. "She's responsible, dedicated, and gives 110 percent all the time. She can take constructive criticism very well — she always wants to learn."

In addition to that, said Bossio, Fagan's personality makes her shine.

"She's one of the most loved kids on the team," Bossio said. "She's quiet and reserved, but once you get to know her she's very funny. She loves to laugh and make others laugh."

Derwin agrees with Bossio's assessment. "She's a good teammate. She's fun to play with . . . She's very unselfish and a very hard worker. You enjoy working with her."

Fagan is embarrassed talking about her talent and gives a lot of credit to her teammates. She said she is proud of the team's season, noting, "When we first started the season, we were young. We went through some tough times, but we really finished up strong."

She still has her senior year to look forward to, but Fagan is keeping an eye on the more distant future as well. She said she would like to coach field hockey and had been getting experience working at the White Mountain Sports Camp (held this year at Westfield State College), a program run by UMass coach Pam Hixon.

Eventually, Fagan said, she'd like to pursue a graduate degree in physical therapy, possibly in a position as a graduate assistant for field hockey.

For now though, she sees a good future for herself and the sport. "The skills are constantly improving, especially on turf — it's incredible," Fagan said.

But Fagan should have no trouble matching her skills to those of her opponents, according to Bossio. "She's very agile and mobile," Bossio said. "She gets stronger with every game; in the last two tournament games, she played fantastic."

Does this mean Fagan will be found in the sweeper's spot again next season? Yes, said Fagan. "I think I'm in this spot for the rest of my college career."

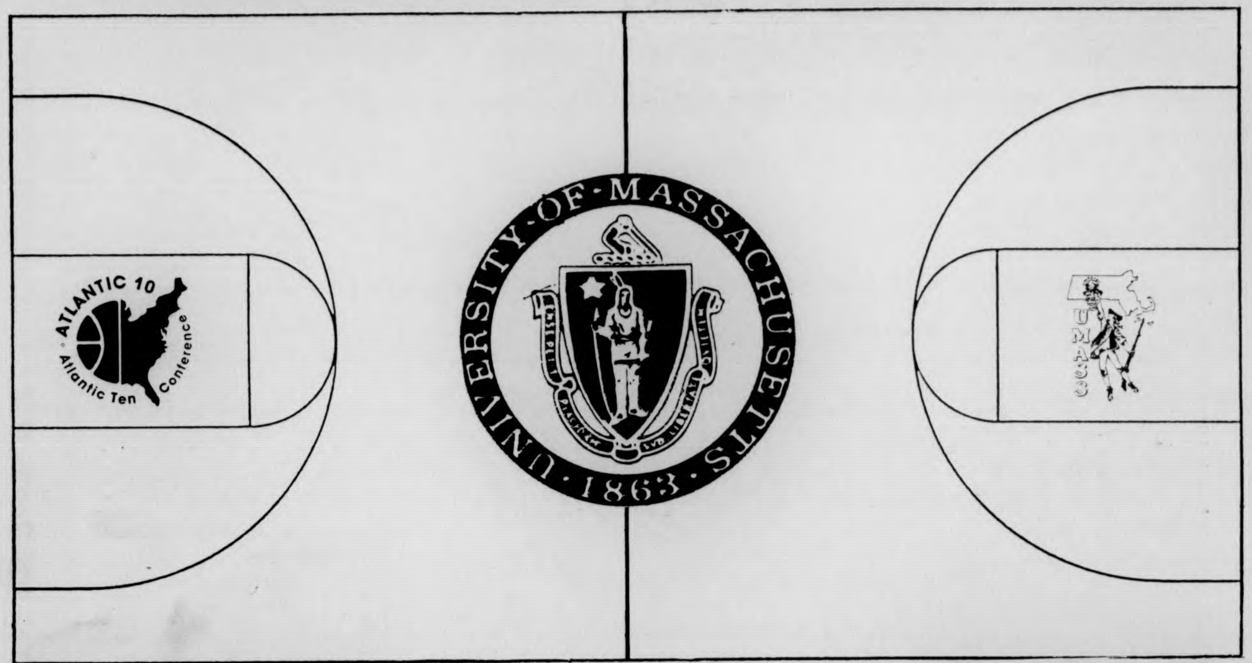
UMass Basketball Preview 1989-90



Building process continues for Minutemen

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

In a few years the words that coach John Calipari is uttering all through the 1989 preseason about the University of Massachusetts basketball team may mean as much to UMass basketball as "Ask not what your country can do for you" did to America or what "I have a dream" meant to the Civil Rights Movement.

"We've built the house, now let's let the paint dry," Calipari has said repeatedly during the weeks leading up to the most current basketball season.

The first coat was brushed over the shingles last year in Calipari's inaugural season with the Minutemen. His first recruit, Jim McCoy established himself as perhaps the best rookie to play for UMass since Julius Erving.

McCoy scored 19.8 points a game from the off guard as well as small forward spot. His exploits did not go unnoticed by anybody. The Atlantic 10 dubbed him its Freshman-of-the-Year and

All-Conference (third team), the only freshman to make that lineup.

McCoy will go back to the two-guard spot this year but Calipari is still expecting him to throw the rock in the hole almost as much. "His role to score, to get us points on the board and to work and defend and trap and do the things he did last year is going to be very similar," Calipari said.

Sophomore guard Anton Brown was the perfect complement for McCoy last season at the point. Brown, as McCoy did, won a starting spot before the season started and became the second Minuteman to be named to the A-10 All-Freshman team. UMass was the only school to place two players on that squad.

Brown dished the ball off, averaging 3.7 points a game. But he proved that he also could fill the hoop up, scoring 12.9 points a game.

The backcourt has almost dried. Now, Calipari is stirring another can of latex for the second coat.

His next additions to UMass fit into the second part of the puzzle, the frontcourt. Having finished last in the Atlantic 10 in defense last season (84.78 points per game) and last in rebounding margin (-3.14 a game), it became obvious that the Minutemen needed some bulk up front.

"I think that personnel-wise, when you're not very big and you don't have people at the center and they can throw it to the post anytime they want, it makes it hard," Calipari said.

Center John Tate did an admirable job last year, finishing third in the A-10 in rebounding (7.75 per game), but he did not have any help in battling the monsters of

Veterans pace Minutewomen

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team is getting there. They're not there yet, but they're moving and improving. Upward mobitity, if you will.

Proof of this is the respect being accorded to the Minutewomen by opposing coaches throughout the Atlantic 10. In the pre-season coaches' poll UMass, coming off an eighth place finish last year, was selected sixth.

"I think that shows the improvement we've made in the last year," said second-year coach Kathy Hewelt. "Other teams are starting to notice us and take us seriously.

"I think sixth place is a realistic prediction. And if we get a couple of breaks who knows, we may slip into the top five."

Coming off an 11-18 (4-14 in the league) record Hewelt welcomes back seven returning players and a talanted group of five freshmen. A major task at hand will be how to compensate for the graduation losses of guard Christel Zullo and forward Beth Wilbor, last season's second- and third-leading scorers respectively, with Wilbor leading the team in rebounding.

For the time being Hewelt will move 5-foot-8 co-captain Sue Serafini to the small forward position and go with a freshman, 5-foot-9 Patty Robak, at the off guard slot. These two should pick up much of the scoring load left by Zullo and Wilbur.

The scoring should come mainly in the form of three-pointers. Of Serafini's 62 field goals last season, 20 of them were for treys. She had a three point success rate of .408. As a sophomore she hit 31 three-pointers and was third in the league for three-point field goal percentage.

Robak comes to UMass with a highly-touted reputation as an outside shooter. Last year she led Our Lady of the Lakes High School in Pontiac, Michigan to an 18-1 record and the top ranking in Class D. Averaging 18.2 ppg and 9.5 rebounds she made first team All-State.

"She's young but she knows the game very well," Hewelt said. "She's got great range and we've turned her completely loose with the three. We give both she and Sue the green light at all times."

Not that UMass is going to go wild this year, throwing up three's from all over the place. That wouldn't be the smartest of things to do with 6-foot-4 senior co-captain Helen Freeman and junior Keyburn McCusker around in the paint.

"One-on-one they're unstoppable," said Serafini. "I don't think there's anyone who can take them."

the conference. Calipari had already went out in search of reinforcements though.

In the fall, he signed 6-foot-6 forward Tony Barbee who hails from Indianapolis, Ind. where basketball is the state pastime and where Bobby Knight is God. The fact that Barbee is a first team All-Indianapolis carries considerable weight in his stature to coaches around the country.

"He needs to get stronger, especially in his legs," Calipari said. "But he's not a bad defender and he's a smart basketball player, he knows how to play the game."

Then there is freshman forward Tom Pace who was the Colorado Gatorade Circle of Champions Player-of-the-Year last season out of Manuel High School, a school that was ranked as high as fifth nationally in USA Today. Another 6-foot-6 rookie, Pace, as Barbee already has, has won a spot in Calipari's top-eight players and should lend a hand in hauling down some rebounds.

"He's pushing himself harder than he ever has," Calipari said. "He's lost 30 pounds and he just gets better every day. I think he is another kid that is really going to be a big help to this program."

But the find of the freshman class may be forward Harper Williams, a 6-foot-7 tower from Bridgeport, Conn. Williams was Co-Mr. Basketball in the State of Connecticut with his teammate Jerome Johnson (who has signed a letter of intent to attend UMass next season) last winter, leading Bassick High School to a 26-0 record and the Class L championship.

"He has real long arms which helps him block shots and rebound," Calipari said. "He could possibly be the leading rebounder in the history of the school. He could if he wanted to this year, average 8-10 rebounds a game. If he wants to."

Williams, along with the other two freshman may be thrown into the fire right away for a very simple reason. "We don't have a lot of players at those positions," Calipari said. "So when they came in, it was not too hard for them to step in and play because we just don't have that many inside guys. That's probably been our weakest area."

Williams has shown early signs that he can mix it up with the trees in the paint. In an exhibition game against Sodertajle of Sweden Nov. 11, he led the Minutemen in rebounding with 10 and also tossed in 14 points.

"When you say who is our best rebounder, our best scorer around the basket, they're going to say Harper Williams," Calipari said.

And when you say best dunker? He's coming but not until the winter semester when he's eligible. High flying William Herndon, a sophomore forward will have to sit out the first five games of the season after transferring from Richmond last year. But when he comes back, the winner of Midnight Madness' slam dunk contest will add to the depth of the bench.

"We'll have a better bench this year when William Herndon comes back after the first five games," Calipari said.

But before Calipari came in and started working his recruiting magic, former coach Ron Gerlufsen had already readied the house with a little thinner. Tate will play a big part in the Minutemen's success this year, but so should junior bomber Rafer Giles and senior guard Cary Herer.

Herer has played sparingly in his first three seasons at UMass, but improved quite a bit over the summer after a trip to Israel in which he played in the Maccabiah games, a Jewish type of Olympics. In three years, Herer has played just 239 minutes in game situations.

"His job is to steady our team, to run our club, to make us a better team. He's shown great leadership," Calipari said. "He's played with reckless abandon . . . He's got a lot of confidence in his game right now. He knows he can help us and so do I."

"It's been a tough three years," Herer said. "But I think I'm ready to step up and play."

Giles raised his scoring average last year to 12.4, up from his 10.6 average per game in his freshman campaign. He led the team in three-point shots last season with 60, shooting at a scorching .408 clip. He could be a valuable weapon off the bench for the Minutemen.

"That's the great thing about Rafer Giles," Calipari said. "He accepts his role on this team to help us win which is come off the bench and give us a scoring punch off the bench."

Others that could help out in the backcourt are two local products that will be returning for their senior years. Sean Nelen (South Hadley) and Chris Bailey (Springfield) are two more little men on a team that is stacked with guards.

Lighting up the scoreboard was the least of UMass' problems last season. Only Duquesne (80.75) averaged more points per game than the Minutemen (78.14) in the conference.

But if you take a look at the scoring defense stat in the A-10, the top four defensive teams in the league finished 1-2-3-4 in the standings. West Virginia, who won the conference was second in defense, giving up just 66.22 points a game.

"Right now, the keys for us are probably going to be defense and rebounding," McCoy said. "We can score with anybody in the conference now. The thing is, we have to stop them."

Calipari is building a Star Wars program though. With those three freshmen, Tate and Herndon, the frontcourt should stand tall above last year's frontline which was decimated by the loss of David Brown and Duane Chase. Forwards Ben Grodski along with Michael Byrnes and Matt Anderson complete this year's frontline.

The varnish on the paint will come next year, when Johnson and 7-foot-2 Jeff Meyer from Wausau, Wisc. are applied. Each has signed letters of intent to attend UMass. And along with Kennard Robinson, a 6-foot-10 victim of Proposition 48 this season, Calipari will have a full arsenal.

In the meantime, the 1989-90 season looms. And it seems almost a sure bet that the Minutemen will improve upon last year's 10-18 record (5-13 in the A-10) and eighth place finish in the conference. Some even think UMass could have its first winning season in 11 years.

After all, this is not watercolor we're talking about.

Temple, Rutgers rise to top of A-10

By GEORGE AUSTIN
and JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Nearly every basketball magazine has projected the Atlantic 10 Conference to be among the top 10 leagues in the nation, and with good reason. Four of the 10 teams reached postseason play last year, and there are at least that many teams that could crack the March Madness of the NCAA tournament.

Here is a capsule look at the other nine teams in the conference, in order of predicted finish:

Temple: The Owls have been labeled as the favorite in the Atlantic 10 Conference's pre-season poll. A-10 Player-of-the-Year Mark Macon returns with three mammoths to back him up.

"Mark didn't have too much support last year," Temple coach John Chaney said. "So he was boxed-and-one and triangled-and-twoed everywhere we went."

Macon figures to have the support this season with the conference's leading rebounder, seven-foot junior Duane Causwell, returning to the floor.

The only knock on the other two giants is that they are both inexperienced. Seven-footer Donald Hodge and 6-foot-11 Chris Lovelace are both sophomores, but sat out last year under the guidelines of Proposition 48.

Rutgers: The Scarlet Knights shocked everyone last year by winning the A-10 tournament and making an NCAA appearance.

But this year won't be an easier. But Rutgers has a good deal of returning talent and a bundle of newcomers. Junior forward Tom Savage, second-leading scorer in the conference, returns along with long-ranger Rick Dadika, junior guard Craig Carter and senior center Anthony Duckett.

Among the fresh faces are Syracuse transfers Earl Duncan and Keith Hughes. Wenzel will rely on Duncan to run the show and look to Hughes for inside scoring and rebounding.

"We have a lot of scorers on this team, but we don't need scorers as much as we need rebounders and defense," Wenzel said.

Penn State: Coach Bruce Parkhill will have to do it without his top two scorers from last year, Tom Hovasse and Bruce Blake. With that, the focus will shift heavily onto a pair of young guards in Monroe Brown and Freddie Barnes.

"Last year Tom Hovasse and Bruce Blake were the guys to go to," Parkhill said. "This year the backcourt will play a key role. Obviously losing Tom Hovasse [17.8 points, 7.5 rebounds per game] will be a big adjustment for everybody. We'll have a different look."

But don't count out senior center Ed Fogell (11.4 ppg, 5.0 rpg), who Parkhill hopes will fill the void left by Hovasse.

"I think Ed Fogell should have a good year," Parkhill said.

West Virginia: Coach Gale Catlett has a major rebuilding year ahead of him but he is starting with the top assist man in the conference last year in Steve Berger (6.23 per game). And Catlett has the utmost confidence

'89 title contest a boon for A-10

By JIM CLARK

March, 1988. Morgantown, WV. The Atlantic 10 Conference championship game between Temple and Rhode Island in the 14,000-seat West Virginia Coliseum. Two exciting teams with a lot on the line. National television on ESPN.

Ten thousand empty seats. Embarassing, to say the least.

Now, roll ahead to last March. The Louis Brown Athletic Center in Piscataway, N.J. Host Rutgers playing Penn State for the same title rights. A capacity crowd, waving banners, signs and "Wenz-sicles" and generally screaming themselves hoarse. A beautiful sight from ESPN's perspective, as it drew the largest audience of any championship game that week.

"Millions of people saw that game," said A-10 Commissioner Ron Bertovich. "That's putting our best foot forward."

The reason for that was a shift in the conference tournament format from the year before. The league's worst nightmare came true when it scheduled the entire tourney for one location, and then the host team, West Virginia, didn't make the final game.

"I watched that game on TV and came away with a bad taste," said Rutgers coach Bob Wenzel.

They are the leading returing scorers and everything on offense will start with them.

"Helen's really come into her own," said Hewelt. "Without question [she is] one of the top centers in the conference. She should help up very well inside."

Come into her own she has. Each season Freeman has improved her scoring and rebounding average. As a freshman she recorded numbers of 2.9 ppg and 2.2 rebounds; as a sophomore she averaged 7.2 and 3.5. And finally last season she improved to 12.8 and 5.8.

McCusker, a 6-foot-2 power forward, came back in pre-season minus some excess baggage and the change has brought an improvement that's been quite noticeable.

"She's dropped some weight and is a lot quicker," said Hewelt.

"We expect some great things. She's got the strength and can score inside."

The remaining starter is the lady who will try to get everyone to mesh together on the floor. Senior Michele Pytko (5-foot-10) will return to the point guard position after missing 22 games last season with a knee injury. Hewelt is counting on Pytko's size to pay dividends.

"She's got great size in the point guard spot. We can move her around and post her up. Not too many teams can match up with her," Hewelt said.

Will Pytko be able to move the ball around and run the offense?

"She's a calming influence on the floor," said Hewelt. "For a big girl she's got excellent ball handling skills and spreads the ball around nicely. She's also capable of racking off a 15- to 20-point night."

Pytko will be the one to get UMass out and running on the break, something Hewelt wants to do a lot of this year.

"Anytime we can kick it out and run we will, but we've got to be smart enough to recognize it," said Hewelt. "If we don't have it we're always looking low first and outside shot second."

The team is hoping 5-foot-4 junior Trish Riley will be around to help out at the point guard position. After taking over for the injured Pytko last season she led the team in assists with 105. So far this year however Riley has not been able to practice due to an injury. She has, for lack of a better medical term, an inflammation above her right hip.

"Right now she's totally inactive. We'll have to wait and see," said Hewelt.

Beyond the starting five the Minutewomen figure to go five players deep, three of whom are rookies.

Six-foot sophomore Lisa Hair, 6-foot freshmen Lisa Ireland and Kim Kristofik figure to be key front court reserves along with 5-foot-10 sophomore Jennyfer Moran.

"Lisa Hair's improved this year," said Hewelt. "She's not coming in with freshman jitters.

"She gives me flexibility. We can use her at the three, four or five position."

While Hair brings flexibility, Ireland brings flat out intensity onto the court. She has drawn rave reviews for her play around the basket.

"She's got the talent and is very aggressive on the court," said Hewelt.

In the backcourt UMass will turn to freshman Gloria Nevarez off the bench. Nevarez came a great distance to play in The Cage — she went to Santa Clara HS in California — and Hewelt has been impressed with what she's done so far.

"Gloria can come in and play the two spot," she said. She's a winner and a tenacious defender. She goes to the boards well and is strong for her size."

The fact that Nevarez can also move to the small forward position gives Hewelt more flexibility.

While UMass may not be ready to crack the big three of Penn State, St. Josephs and Rutgers ("They're leagues ahead of where we are," said Hewelt) with Hewelt's coaching, her career mark as a head coach is 128-77, and a recruiting plan that knows no geographical boundaries you can bet that in the not-to-distant future the Minutewomen will be ready to join the elite of the Atlantic 10.

A-10 looks for push from bottom teams

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 Conference is slowly but surely emerging as one of the top leagues in women's basketball, with four of its schools qualifying and winning a game in the NCAA tournament last year.

One might think that boom — there goes the parity in that league, but not only are the top teams getting stronger, the cellard-wellars are creeping toward the surface.

The four schools (West Virginia, St. Joseph's, Rutgers and Temple) which represented the A-10 in the NCAAs will once again claim their spots as the conference's top dogs, while Penn State will jump back into the upper echelon after an off year spent tightroping the .500 line.

Those teams will keep expanding the A-10's growing national reputation, but it is the rest of the five schools to improve and increasing the level of play within the league.

"The A-10 overall is a much stronger conference," said St. Joseph's coach Jim Foster. "The teams that have been weak in the past all seem to be heading in the right direction."

If the bottom five teams are looking for a team to model themselves after, then Foster's Hawks is the team.

Following five consecutive 20-win seasons and NCAA appearances, St. Joseph's might have their best squad this year. Led by All-American candidate Dale Hodges, the Hawks return four starters, losing only All-Conference forward Kim Foley.

"We're looking forward to this season," Foster said. "We feel we've got an exciting team with Dale, and she'll be fun to watch. We're deeper than last year, with everyone on the team capable of stepping in to contribute."

Penn State was selected as the A-10's preseason favorites by the league's coaches, and with five pretty good reasons — five returning starters.

Susan Robinson, the A-10's Freshman of the Year last season, returns with 6-foot-4 center Adrie DeVries as the starters down low. The Lady Lions are also solid in the backcourt with Tanya Garner and Dana Eikenberg, who both exceeded the 100-assist mark in last year's 14-14 campaign. Stefeni Thomas, a 6-foot sophomore forward, returns after sitting out last year.

West Virginia is an example of what can happen on any given night in the A-10. Seeded fifth in the A-10 Tournament, the Mountaineers defeated No. 4 Penn State and then shocked top seed St. Joe's in the semifinals. West Virginia proceeded to beat No. 3 Temple in the finals, prompting an automatic NCAA bid.

The Mountaineers return some big people upfront, namely 6-0 Donna Abbott, 6-2 Lori Wilson, and the conference's tallest player, 6-5 Tracy Slogik.

But West Virginia apparently didn't gain any respect as the defending A-10 champions, as they were only picked fourth in the preseason poll.

"We never worry about where they rank us because it's only a poll," said West Virginia coach Kittie Blakemore. "We do have a lot of freshmen and sophomores and it's going to be hard to replace some seniors."

The addition of at least one freshman, Christy Cooper, certainly won't hurt. Cooper, an in-stater from Circleville, averaged 59.3 (that's no typo, folks) points per game.

Rutgers will be working toward a fifth straight NCAA appearance, but coach Theresa Grentz will only have forwards Vicki Picott and Lynn Ust as her returning starters.

The Lady Knights, who were picked second in the poll, will have a tall sophomore class (four six-footers) but more importantly, Rutgers will have to replace both star-

Minutewomen find a leader in Serafini

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The three-pointer. The trey. Bombs away. Long distance.

With the advent of the three-point rule in college basketball the three-point shot is a major part of a team's offense. Such is life for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team.

"The three's going to be a very big part of our offense this year," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt.

With that in mind Sue Serafini will also be a big part of the UMass offense. You see, the three-point shot and Serafini go together like Thanksgiving and turkey. You can't think about one without the other entering your mind.

Beginning her senior year the co-captain has made 55 out of 147 three point attempts, a .364 shooting percentage. As a sophomore she was third in the conference in three-point field goal percentage (.345) and last year she banged home 20 of 49 attempts.

"My three's are what I do best," states Serafini. "I look inside to Keyburn (McCusker) and Helen (Freeman) first, but after that I'm looking to shoot the three-pointer."

Serafini's long range bombing is beneficial to the other four players on the floor. When the ball's in her hands the defense must come out on her and as a result gets stretched, opening up avenues for the other offensive players.

"She gives us an outside dimension that causes defenses to react to her," said Hewelt. "Her shooting allows our post players some space."

But Serafini's worth to the team goes farther beyond her shooting. Elected co-captain by her fellow players, she has the respect of every UMass player as well as

"As a senior she knows what's going on. She can help the players on the bench. She serves as a facilitator for us," said Hewelt. "She helps us so much on and off the court."

Being captain is an honor that Serafini does not take lightly.

"It's something I've really wanted since high school. And it's special because this group of players mean a lot to me. They're my family," she said.

The family type atmosphere is something that Serafini tries to instill and nurture on the team.

"My goal as captain is to help this team be a family, to be close," she said.

An example of this occured in the preseason when one of Hewelt's prized freshman was experiencing some problems adjusting to college life off the court. After falling behind academically Hewelt chose to suspend the player until a marked improvement became evident.

One night Serafini went to the player's dorm room for a heart-to-heart talk.

"I talked to her as my sister, I didn't talk down to her," Serafini recalled. "I told her I had confidence in her and that anything I could do to help her I would. I said I'd help her study or find other people to help her."

That's Sue Serafini. Always willing to lend a hand. Always treating people as her equals not her inferiors. As Hewelt puts it, "She loves to help others."

The 5-foot-8 senior from Peckville, PA came to UMass four years ago as a high school hotshot. She scored a record 2,181 points and averaged over 20 points a game during her four-year career at Valley View High School. An All-State pick as a senior she led her team to the PIAA II District Championship.

When the college coaches came calling Serafini narrowed her choices to Penn State, Seton Hall, East Carolina and UMass.

"I wanted to go into a program where I could bring the program respect in the conference. I wanted to work hard to bring pride to the place I chose."

That place happened to be UMass. And while she's a star now, success did not come quickly to Serafini. Eight games into her rookie campaign she badly hurt her knee. The diagnosis was a torn anterior cruciate ligament.

"That injury really affected her for a while," said Hewelt. "Mentally the more she plays the better she gets. She's taking it to the glass now instead of pulling up. She's more relaxed."

Serafini disagrees, saying her injury affected her physically but not mentally. "I lost my quick step with the knee injury, but I never accepted the injury so I really don't think about it in my mind." Serafini got through her injury with hard work and her firm belief in God. She is quick to talk about her Christian values.

"What gets me through all the hard times is my faith in God. I'm a Christian. He's been there through everything. I realize that the Lord gave me talent," Serafini said. "I play because of the happiness it brings God and the people around me."

Coming back from the injury as a sophomore Serafini averaged 5.2 ppg and last year 6.1. Despite her shooting ability, scoring is not what Serafini thinks about first each time down the court.

"I'm interested in running the offense. I'm conditioned to look inside at Keyburn and Helen," she said.

After this season is over and she graduates Serafini has a couple of options. Coaching or physical therapy lie on the horizon for the personable Physical Education major.

"I really enjoy coaching and I want to help out the staff next year as an assistnt," she said.

Four years after selecting UMass as her home away from home Serafini is quite happy with the decision, both on and off the basketball court.

"I've gotten so much more out of UMass than I expected. Through each and every experience I've learned so much about myself.

"The coaching staff (that came in last season), the way they care about each player in this program is awesome," she said.

The same could be said for the way Sue Serafini cares about her teammates.

ting guards.

Temple moved into the Big Five last year with their first NCAA appearance and a school-record 22 wins. But like Rutgers, the Lady Owls return only two starters — All-Conference forward Kelly Lane and Rhonda Bates.

Coach Linda McDonald will be looking to keep the Lady Owls in the upper half of the A-10, which is the eventual goal of all the remaining school in the conference.

UMass (see front cover) tied with George Washington for sixth in the preseason poll, but the Minutewomen have a stronger nucleus of players coming back. GW will be going through what UMass went through last year — adjusting to a new head coach.

Joe McKeown will take over a George Washington squad that just fell short of the .500 mark both overall and in the conference. His first-year efforts will be aided by guard Karin Vadelund, who'll be expected to pick up most of the slack.

St. Bonaventure will be looking to stay out of the conference cellar, which will most likely be occupied by Duquense and Rhode Island.

Lady Bonnies coach Mary Jane Telford has Sue Shay, a member of the A-10 All-Freshman team, as well as three other starters. But two of those starters — junior forwards Leslie McGhee and Lisa Marquis — are banged up, and Telford must hope that her other returning lettermen can pick up the load.

Duquense and Rhode Island have new head coaches in Renee DeVarney and Linda Zeimke, respectively. Both will have the majority of last year's respective 5-13 and 1-17 squads coming back, but the Duchesses and the WRams will be basically be returning something from nothing.

Telford's vision of the Atlantic 10 is perhaps the most accurate. "The A-10 is stronger than ever from top to bottom. You have the return of the top five teams but the other five are stronger across the board, which is certainly going to be better for the conference."

in his senior point guard who also scored 12.3 points a game for him in his most recent season.

"I wouldn't trade him [Berger] for any point guard in America," Catlett said. "Barring none. You can talk about Chris Jackson of LSU, all those guys. I wouldn't trade Steve Berger for them because he's my coach on the floor.

Junior forward Chris Brooks also returns with his 12.5 points and 5.2 rebounds a game from last year. Sophomore guard Tracy Shelton should also log some hefty minutes for the Mountaineers in the backcourt. Junior college pickup Charles Becton will compete for the vacated forward position left by Darryl Prue.

Rhode Island: Second-year coach Al Skinner looks to bring Rhode Island back to the top. Senior guard Eric Leslie (16.8 ppg, 104 assists) sparked the backcourt and will look to feed the inside to fellow All-Atlantic 10 selection Kenny Green.

Green, however, has been plagued by bad knees throughout his collegiate career. "I don't foresee any problems with him not being healthy," Skinner said.

Joining the cast this year will be transfers Frenchy Tomlin (Cleveland State) Keith Manuel (Texas El-Paso) and Mike Brown (Cal-State Fullerton), along with touted freshman guard Carlos Easterling.

Duquesne: The Dukes come back with a new coach, John Carroll and a senior transfer from Notre Dame which they are touting as the best player to grace the Dukes' floor since Norm Nixon in 1977.

Mark Stevenson, the forward/guard from ND, has had a year off since transferring from South Bend but is drawing rave reviews from the coaching staff, especially after his 35-point outburst against a Swedish club team in the preseason.

"He spoke for himself that night with his actions on the court," Carroll said.

Junior Clayton Adams, who was second in the A-10 in assists last year (5.48) behind Berger, returns to the point. with senior Brian Anselmino, a 6-foot-8 center, in the pivot.

St. Joseph's: Coach Jim Boyle's Hawks finished, 8-21 overall, 4-14 in the A-10 finished ninth in the conference last year. And with the improvement around the league, may find it hard to move any further up the ladder this season.

Sophomore returnee Craig Amos was an A-10 All-Freshman selection at forward last year. Amos put 11.2 points per game and 3.4 rebounds per game on the board. 6-foot-7 junior Marlon Miller returns to forward with 8.1 points per game from last year and five rebounds a game.

Boyle would like to surprise this year. "Rutgers is our model of the year," Boyle said. "We're going out to try to turn it around like Rutgers did last year."

St. Bonaventure: Just four players return, but first-year coach Tom Chapman will mold them with possibly a world record for transfers (five) and a pair of Prop 48s.

It will be up to guards Rob Lanier and Michael Burnett and forward Kyle Anglin to share the scoring load. Prop 48 Donald Burnett (Michael's brother) and freshman Jason Brower appear to be the best of the newcomers.

"I don't know how much hard work and positive attitude can do," Chapman said, "but we're taking that approach. I think St. Bonaventure is a program on the rise.

"Right now we're ranked 10th. Dick Vitale picked us 11th, but he also picked Italy in World War II," Chapman quipped.

George Washington: The Colonials finished in the cellar of the A-10 at 1-17 as well as 1-27 overall in 1989. Its only win came against UMass at the Charles E. Smith Center.

Forward/guard Glen Sitney comes back to claim his team lead in scoring from a year ago (14.3). And senior forward Mike Jones returns as the team's leading rebounder from last season.

"The reason that we're going to win this year is because of him [Jones]," George Washington coach John Kuester said. "He's brought a tremendous amount of leadership this year."

But there is also 6-foot-11 center Clint Holtz, a former recruit of UMass, who played for the A-10 All-Star team that toured Sweden and Finland this past summer.

■ television and the A-10

So, for 1989, the first three rounds were held at a neutral site — the Palestra in Philadelphia, with the title game at the home of the highest-seeded championship team.

"In the future it might be changed," Bertovich said of the new setup. "It's not ideal, but it's workable and it meets our objectives, which is television and fans."

"This guarantees that the championship game will always be a big event," Wenzel said. "Wherever the game is played, it's going to be bedlam."

In these times, a league or a team can't survive without high amounts of exposure. The Rutgers-Penn State game raised a few eyebrows for the conference.

"I definitely believe it was perceived as a quality championship game," said Rhode Island coach Al Skinner. "One of the advantages is that it guarantees a sellout."

However, Penn State coach Bruce Parkhill feels that it puts one of the two teams at a big disadvantage.

"I'm not in favor of that format," Parkhill said. "I think the championship tournament should be at a neutral site. I can understand why they did it, but my philosophy is to play at a neutral site and let the two teams fight it out."

But Parkhill agreed that last year's game did the conference a world of good.

"Obviously it enhances the perception of the league," he said. "A lot of people came up to me and said that it's a tougher league than they thought it was."

First-year Duquesne coach John Carroll, who was an assistant at Seton Hall last year, has been impressed with the Atlantic 10 so far.

"Every year the A-10 is knocking on the door, and making inroads in recruiting," Carroll said. "There's been tremendous growth in the league."

Probably the biggest reason last year's championship game was such a success is that it broke down the image that the Atlantic 10 is a "two-team" league.

"When Georgetown, St. John's and Syracuse win every year, that's fine," Carroll said from his Big East perspective. "But when Seton Hall and Providence make the Final Four, that's the best thing that can ever happen."

"The teams in the finals spoke more of our conference than any other thing," said Temple coach John Chaney. "Other coaches should feed off of that. When you look at a conference where Penn State and Rutgers represented us so well, you realize you're in good company and good hands.

"It's all because that visibility has enhanced our image tremendously, to the point where we may get more teams in postseason play," Chaney added.

"When St. Bonaventure and Duquesne and UMass win, it's great for the league," Carroll said. "It's great when certain teams are on top, but when other teams emerge, that's even better."

This season, there will be 75 regular season games on TV, as well as the semifinals and final of the A-10 tourney.

"We're not satisfied, but it's a step in the right direction," Bertovich said. "Seventy-five games is a far cry from five years ago. All in all the pieces are fitting together.

"We're not there yet, but we're getting close."

Klarsfeld makes Nazis face past

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

The Holocaust must not be dismissed as a historic accident and German citizens have a responsibility to help Jewish people wherever they are being persecuted, said Nazi-hunter Beate Klarsfeld last night.

Speaking to a crowd of 400 in the Student Union Ballroom, Klarsfeld said that although the younger German generations are not to blame for Naziism, they have to acknowledge it as part of their heritage.

Klarsfeld, a German Protestant, and her husband Serge, a French Jew whose father died at the Auschwitz Nazi death camp, have dedicated their lives to exposing unpunished Nazi war criminals and bringing them to trial for their past deeds.

Finding the war criminals, she said, is not as difficult as it might seem. According to Klarsfeld, most Nazis still at large are not hiding in South America, but living under their own names in West Germany. Sometimes it is as simple as looking up their names in the telephone directory, she said.

Making the distinction between German military soldiers and the Nazi war criminals she seeks to punish, Klarsfeld said she singles out "those who signed the documents [for deportation to concentration camps]."

Although she and her husband are best known for hunting Nazi war criminals, Klarsfeld said "that is but one aspect of our work, and certainly not the most important one."

The Klarsfelds have established an educational foundation. Using documentaion of Nazi war crimes, it is devoted to countering propaganda that the Holocaust did not occur, she said.

Holocaust revisionists, said Klarsfeld, often claim that the genocide statistics are exaggerated. Countering these charges, the Klarsfelds are publishing lists of hundreds of thousands of names and birthdates of Jews sent to concentration camps, she said.

At the trial of Gestapo Chief Klaus Barbie, his lawyer denied that Barbie deported 44 Jewish children of the Izieu orphanage, and suggested that the children were now successful businessmen in Israel, Klarsfeld said.

The Klarsfelds responded, she said, by compiling dozens of documents and photos to use as evidence in the courtroom, and to keep the children's memory alive.

Klarsfeld said her anti-Nazi activism periodically endangers her life. She said she once received a suspicious package and had it inspected by the police. It contained a box of candy stuffed with dynamite and nails, she added.

"Every occupation has its risks," said Klarsfeld.

Child care: no cuts

By ANNE RUSS
Collegian Correspondent

The child care system at the University of Massachusetts has been spared from the battery of cuts that have descended upon other programs, according to Alicia Smith, administrator of the University Child Care Program.

She added that any cut in funds could severely decrease the quality of the currently provided child care on campus.

"The reason we have a quality program is because we have the support of the University," she said.

Smith also said that a commitment from the University shows we are investing in the future of our children.

The program, consisting of the Grass Roots and New World day care centers, provide day care to the children of undergraduate and graduate students and faculty and staff. It is funded by the University, Smith said, and therefore requires less money from the parents and can provide high quality care.

The program provides care for 82 children, she said. Once admitted into the program, the children are provided day care until they are five, Smith said.

Rosenberg continues fight for funding

The fight against budget cuts is not over yet, according to Massachusetts Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst.

He is once again asking students to inform legislators that they will not stand for the proposed $25 million in cuts to public higher education.

"What I'm urging is that every in-state student call their parents tomorrow and tell them this is the moment of truth," Rosenberg said in a telephone interview last night.

Dick Cooney, of the University of Massacusetts office of University of Relations and Development, said the Newman Center will reopen the phone bank tomorrow at 10 a.m. and will provide a list of legislators to target.

Rosenberg said the House of Representatives will debate a tax package this week that could mean the reversion of the proposed $6.4 million in cuts to the UMass, he said.

The House Ways and Means Committee is scheduled to vote tomorrow on how much money the tax package would include.

Massachusetts has a deficit of $730 million, and the most the tax plan would save would be $300 million, Rosenberg said.

He said he hopes the package would restore $50 to $100 million to the public higher education.

"We're trying to restore services that have been cut much, much too deeply," he said.

If the tax package is approved, part or all of the $350 fee increase for next semester could be reversed, he said.

Rosenberg said the package would have no bearing on the proposed $3,000 tuition increase for out-of-state students.

Czech student reflects on reforms in homeland

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

As the recent demonstrations in Czechoslovakia are causing the foundation of the longtime Communist Party to crumble, Silvia Burk can only read about the events that are changing the shape of her homeland.

Although this University of Massachusetts student is overwhelmed with happiness for her country, she feels isolated in the United States.

"There is no one around here, not even my husband, who can share these feelings with me as enthusiastically and as closely as I would be sharing with my countrymen in Czechoslovakia," she said.

To bring her closer to the events that will effect Eastern European history, she has spoken to her parents in Czechoslovakia every day since the demonstrations began Nov. 16.

Burk was born in Bratislava in 1962 and married UMass professor of music Dennis Burkh in 1983. The couple relocated to the Unites States the same year.

When Burk heard news of the recent events in Czechoslovakia, she said she was scared because the first reports were of the student demonstrators in Wenceslas Square being met with brutal police force.

"I thought it was going to be the next Tiananmen Square," Burk said, who had a petition ready to circulate asking President George Bush to condemn the Czech government for using force against the students.

But the police involvement at the next day's demonstrations was quite different. Burk learned from her father that police were merely directing traffic during the protests. The first few times she spoke to her father she said he was afraid to discuss the demonstrations and told her nothing much was happening. After the events were televised in Czechoslovakia, he asked her, "Didn't you see us on television? You should be here."

He told her he didn't know one person who was not participating in Monday's strike, which called for an end to the communist government and attracted a majority of the country's 15 million people.

She said her family is excited about the changes and hopes the Civic Forum, the opposition group, will negotiate reforms to reduce oppression.

Burk said she distinctly remembers the annual Czechoslovakian May Day celebration in 1968 when she was six years old. People were cheerful and enthusiastic about Democratic reforms proposed by then General Secretary Alexander Dubcek, she said.

Three months later, Warsaw Pact armies led a seven-day invasion through Czechoslovakia because of a fear that the country would leave the pact and become a neutral country, she said.

After the invasion, which removed Dubcek from power, Burk said it was unsafe for people to discuss politics on the streets because they feared undercover spies would report them for dissenting against the government.

"The contrast sticks so strongly in my mind," Burk said. "My mother was so excited about Dubcek that she kissed his picture. After the invasion she forbade me to use his name on the street or in school."

The Communist Party in Czechoslovakia feared the reforms and increased openness, or glasnost, that they anticipated Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev would propose when he visited Czechoslovakia in 1987.

Because of glasnost and the extraordinary events of East Berlin, Hungary and Poland, the Czech people feel more forceful and will try to literally push the government down, she said.

Burk hopes the Czech people will receive more education and a more objective view of world history as a result of current political change.

■ child care

With University funding, the program can pay its teachers more, attracting the most qualified and experienced teachers.

Even with the current funding, however, there is a long waiting list to obtain slots in the program, according to Smith. She said that because the program is funded through the University, it is vulnerable to budget cuts, and that the waiting lists could conceiveably grow.

In deciding which children will obtain a slot in the child care program, Smith explained that many factors are considered, including the child's gender, age, and ethnicity. She said these variables are considered to promote a balanced environment for the children. It is important that this environment be balanced sexually, racially, and culturally, she said.

Margaret Arsenault is a program advisor at the Student Activities Office whose 2 1/2-year-old son has been in the child care program since August. She said the program allows her to have a career and know at the same that her child is getting the best care.

Gay Rights Bill passes after 17 years

Petition could jeopardize the new law; UMass students have mixed reactions

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff
and LAUREN McDADE
Collegian Correspondent

"It is hereby found and declared that the sexual orientation of a person is an invalid basis for discrimination in areas of housing, employment and the granting of credit."
— from the Gay Rights Law.

After 20 years of struggle by the Massachusetts gay, lesbian, and bisexual community, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis signed a law on Nov. 15 prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation. This makes Massachusetts the second state in the country to have such a law.

But opponents of the law renewed the struggle within 24 hours, filing a petition for a 1990 ballot referendum to repeal the law.

The group has until Feb. 15, when the law goes into effect, to gather 25,263 signatures in order to have the question on the ballot next November.

Collegian photo by Maureen Burt

Students rally at the Student Union steps during Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Awareness Week.

The opponents said they have decided not to try for suspension, which would erase the law, because it would require nearly 10,000 additional signatures. They have opted instead to let the voters decide, they said.

With the passage of this law, the gay community is apparently gaining support in Massachusetts. But many are questioning whether or not the law will have an effect on the attitudes of those outside the gay community. Reaction to the law from students at the University of Massachusetts is mixed:

"It's about time," Ann Lozier said.

"In regard to visibility, the passing of the bill is an immense step forward," said Joe Mangini.

"One half of me is very happy, but the other finds it so pathetic that it is even necessary," said Kristen Chapman.

However, some students, who would not give their names, said they felt homosexuality is morally wrong and that the bill protects the immorality.

Max Mitchell, president of the UMass Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance, said, "We're all very pleased. There's still a long way to go . . . Certain amendments on the bill need to be worked on . . . but it's a sign of how this country's attitudes are changing. It's a positive step forward."

According to officials from the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, which handles civil rights violations, the current discrimination law protects against discrimination based on race, color, religious creed, national origin, sex, age, ancestry and handicap.

The new law adds "sexual orientation" to the list of civil rights and allows the commission to hear such cases in court.

The only other state with a gay rights law is Wisconsin, which passed it in 1982. Six other states are currently debating the issue.

Steven Tierney, co-chairperson of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus said gay rights bills have been in legislation for 17 years and have always either died in committee or been defeated on the floor.

"Most legislators have seen the need and supported the bill for a couple of years but our opponents were able to kill the bill with amendments and committees," Tierney said. "This year we focused our efforts on moving the bill along. We learned to play their game and win."

According to Tierney, there was no legal recourse to counter discrimination based on sexual orientation in cases of housing, employment, and credit.

"The Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts couldn't hear possible discrimination 'cases' because there were no standing laws which would make up such a case," Tierney said.

> "One half of me is very happy, but the other finds it pathetic that it is even necessary."
> – Kristen Chapman, UMass student

He said the court recommended legislation that would make it possible for them to hear and judge the discrimination cases.

In order for the bill to pass, Tierney said amendments were added to the bill so it would be misread as supporting homosexuality. Tierney said his group was not happy with the amendments but allowed them to go in so that the bill would pass.

The first of these amendments will allow churches to continue to discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation, he said.

The second amendment states that homosexual couples may not be foster parents because studies have shown it could be damaging to the children. However, Tierney noted that 90 percent of child sexual abuse is committed by heterosexual men.

The remaining amendments state "nothing in this act shall be considered as an approval or endorsement of homosexuality, bisexuality, or to legitimize homosexual marriage."

> "It's a sign of how this country's attitudes are changing. It's a positive step foward."
> – Max Mitchell, LBGA president

Yet, even with the amendments, the opponents' petition could still kill the new law several months after it goes into effect in February.

Attorney General James Shannon will decide the legality of the petition before it can be released for signatures. Shannon, an advocate of the bill, said the petition must not infringe on people's constitutional rights.

A spokesperson from the office of state Sen. Edward Kirby (R-Whitman), an opponent to the bill and a chief sponsor of the referendum fight, said the petition's release is being delayed by the attorney general.

Coming out for a stroll around campus, a gay couple tours the University.

Nancy Sutton, chairwoman of Family First, the organization heading the opposition to the law, agreed that the attorney general is interfering with the democratic process by delaying the release of the petition.

"The homosexual community is challenging the petition on the grounds that it is not constitutional ," she said.

A spokesperson for the attorney general said there was no delay, and legally, bill supporters have until Friday to submit briefs challenging the petition.

The chief sponsor of the bill in the senate, Sen. Michael Barrett (D-Cambridge), said he was optimistic the referendum will fail.

"The public has been very tolerant for anti-discrimination laws for the lesbian, bisexual, and gay community," he said.

Should the referendum go to the polls, Barrett said he expects "a real dogfight . . . People must realize that discrimination will be an option available unless we can persuade them otherwise."

A poll taken by the Boston Globe and WBZ-TV earlier this month shows that the gay rights bill is supported by 70 percent of the voters in the state while 21 percent oppose the measure.

Barrett said he was "attracted by the option that we may get the public's approval if we win the referendum fight big. That would make the bill stronger than ever."

However, LBGA President Max Mitchell said he is concerned the opposition will try to win over those now supporting the law.

New Hispanic center opens

By ELBA QUINONES
Collegian Correspondent

The first Hispanic Cultural Center to receive University funding at the University of Massachusetts will open at 7 tonight in the Moore Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area.

The cultural center is "a small step for the recognition of the Hispanic needs in this institution," said Benjamin Rodriguez, director and one of the founders of the Bilingual Collegiate Program.

Rodriquez said although the University has allotted space for Hispanic cultural centers in the Washington Tower and Goodell Library in the past, a lack of funding led to the demise of each center.

Rodriguez, who is scheduled to speak at the opening, said this is the first time the University administration has taken the initiative of providing this resource for Latin American students.

"The time struggle of the Hispanic community has finally been reached for us to achieve this goal," he said.

The center is the result of a recommendation by the Tillis Commission of 1988, which called for the establishment of the cultural centers to serve the needs of Asian, Native American and Hispanic students, Rodriguez said.

Different sectors of the community, including students, faculty, and staff, have worked together to make the opening possible, said UMass senior Liza Gallardo, former president of the Latin American students organization, AHORA.

The opening activities, scheduled to take place in the main lounge of residence hall, will begin with the unveiling of a pictorial mosaic. Internationally-known Colombian artist and art Professor Leonel Gongors will unveil the mosaic, which honors Don Luis de Gongors y Argote, a famous poet from the 17th century.

The opening will also feature music, dance, poetry and food native to various Latin American countries, said Maria Voohees, academic advisor of the BCP.

The Hispanic Cultural Center has been established to improve the quality of life of the Latin American community, said Kimberly Gonzalez, an advisor to the center.

UMass junior Fernando Acosta, a Puerto Rican student, said, "This center will also provide an opportunity for non-Latin American students to learn about our countries and cultures from a Latin American point of view."

Spotlight: Kappa Alpha Psi

By REBECCA BOSWELL
Collegian Correspondent

Kappa Alpha Psi was founded Jan. 5, 1911.

The organization incorporates its fundamental purpose of achievement with the following five main objectives: 1) to unite college men through culture, patriotism and honor in a bond of fraternity, 2) to encourage honorable achievement in every human endeavor, 3) to promote the spiritual, social, intellectual, and moral welfare of its members, 4) to assist in the aims and purposes of colleges and universities, 5) and to inspire service in the public interest.

One of the Kappa's national public service projects is the Guideright Program.

Its purpose is to inspire youths towards achievement. In the past, the Kappa's have played an active role in the walk to help fund the A Better Chance Center in Amherst.

The Kappas are also creating a scholarship program at the University of Massachusetts to alleviate tuition fees.

There are chapters in Hawaii and West Germany. The Nu Tau chapter of UMass was officially chartered March 10, 1989. It has seven members, two of whom attend American International College in Springfield.

The president of the Nu Tau chapter is V. Van Johnson III. Van Johnson is a junior legal studies major at UMass. He is a resident assistant in Kennedy Residence Hall in Southwest.

The vice-polemarch or vice-president of the Kappas is Shane A. Whitehorne. He is a junior legal studies major at UMass and the coordinator of the Malcolm X Center in Southwest. He is also a resident assistant in John Adams Residence Hall.

K A Ψ

The Keeper of the Records is Gregory S. Thomas, a junior COINS major at UMass. Thomas is the supervisor of the Banneker Computer Center and also works as a consultant for G.S. Thomas Computer Consultants. Raymond Echols is the Keeper of the Exchequer. He is a senior at the American International College in Springfield, where he is also captain of the AIC basketball team.

The Kappas have distinguished themselves in many areas at the University.

Kevin A. Mitchell is a junior BDIC major. He is the program director of WMUA and hosts his own show on Saturday nights from 9 p.m. to midnight. He is a college marketing representative for CBS records and manages his own disc-jockey service.

William Anthony Walker, a senior STEPEC major, is the president of the Pan Hellenic Council which serves as the official representative to the public and the UMass administrators for Black sororities and fraternities. Kappa Donald Dominique is the vice-president of the Pride Student Organization.

The director of the UMass Campus Center, William H. Harris is a Kappa alumni. Arthur Jackson, the financial aid director at UMass is also a Kappa alumni. They both serve as advisors to the fraternity.

New World Theater's 10th anniversary arrives

By ANITA BERMISS
Collegian Correspondent

Before 1979 students of color at the University of Massachusetts were not exposed to culturally diverse plays from the University theater community.

Now, 10 years later, the situation in the surrounding area has changed substantially because of an organization called New World Theater.

During the weekend of Dec. 8, New World Theater will be celebrating its 10th anniversary.

"There are many reasons to celebrate," says Pam Tillis, a coordinator at New World Theater. "We are now an established organization with some of the highest standards around the country."

New World Theater was founded by Roberta Uno Thelwell in 1979. There was a need for this multicultural organization because of the growing community of minority students, said Thelwell.

New World Theater started as a series of "third world" plays which addressed the various identities of the multicultural experience at the University.

With the vision of the people of the New World Theater, the group has flourished into an organization that is known to "provide a cultural alternative in theater," said Glen Siegal, author of Ten Years of Working Towards a New World.

"New World Theater remains the University's most successful model of true interracial cooperation," Siegal said.

During the past 10 years, the objectives of New World Theater have not changed. Its foremost goal is to "provide a place where people of different ethnicities, different colors, can come together, can learn about each other, and can make the University environment more like they wish the world would be," Thelwell said.

"I don't think there is one form that is appropriate to express the incredible wealth of our experience," said Thelwell.

The weekend begins with a gallery opening, which will display a poster exhibit that spans the 10 years of New World Theater. On the evening of Dec. 8, there will be a performance by the Puerto Rican Traveling Theater with their production, "Ariano."

On Dec. 9, there will be a panel discussion entitled "Meeting at the Crossroads." Various multi-cultural leaders, such as Miriam Colon, Viola Thomas, Rick Khan, and Woodie King will serve as panelists in a discussion over the future of Third World theater.

On the same day, there will also be a banquet luncheon with key-note speaker Shauneille Perry, a performance by the Spiderwoman Theater and a performance by Jude Narita, followed by another gallery exhibit.

Finally, on Sunday, Dec. 10, there will be a panel discussion entitled "Tradition and A New Aesthetic," which will concern contemporary applications of multicultural theater.

A matinee will follow with New World Theater's own ensemble cast performing an original production of Unfinished Women Cry in No Man's Land While a Bird Dies in a Gilded Cage.

"We could have just celebrated the 10th anniversary with the performance of one production," said Thelwell. "Instead, we wanted to show a variety of strategies for a accomplishing the same goals — cultural identity."

TIPS FOR LOWERING SODIUM INTAKE

- Don't add salt to your foods! Experiment with different types of seasonings such as Mrs. Dash,basil or oregano.
- Become a 'label-concious' shopper. Look for labels which say that the product is low in sodium at 140 ml/serving.
- Toss the potato chips, Goldfish, beer and nuts for fresh fruit and vegetable snacks.

Practicality crushes critical thought

Al Arpad

If I could start my college education over again, I wouldn't major in English. It's not the same thing it used to be.

When my parents were in school, English was a respectable major, as well as the most vital part of a liberal arts curriculum. English majors learned to think, and graduates could do almost anything, from law school to advertising, though many obviously chose to pursue the study of literature.

I think the study of literature is important too, although I'm not one of those culture cranks who wants every college student to do four years of mandatory Shakespeare. In fact, I wonder if, in its pursuit of the muse, the ideal of the liberal arts hasn't strayed a little too far from practicality.

When my parents were in school, college English departments taught things like grammar, rhetoric and logic, technical subjects which apply to real-life writing as well as literature. Since then, those subjects have been largely relinquished to other departments, such as linguistics, communications and philosophy.

Even the English Writing Program, which provides the single required course that could give all students an introduction to English, is separated from the rest of the department, like a big underfunded ghetto, accepting out of necessity a bare standard of literacy from much of the student population.

I asked several of my professors over the years why the department no longer offers those more technical courses on use of the language. They talked about budget constraints and avoiding duplication between departments, but the reason I heard again and again, the one that really sticks in my mind, is that courses on grammar, rhetoric and logic are too boring.

Boring to teach, boring to learn. Nobody would sign up.

Oddly enough though, lots of people are signing up to be communications majors. I understand they have an outrageously competitive admissions process. The classes in Rhetorical Theory or the Uses of Metaphor are oversubscribed.

Which means not only that I can't take these classes as part of my major; I probably can't take them at all.

Ironically, the number of English majors at UMass is increasing steadily, despite the increasingly pedantic dissociation of literature from the real-world concerns that inspired the great authors. But I believe that many students choose an English major because of a reputation for rigorous intellectual activity that the department as a whole may no longer deserve.

It's sad that a department that should be among the most vital on campus has chosen to turn away from the very aspects of liberal education that brought practical results, and made it a widely respected ideal. It's frightening, however, if critical thinking is no longer part of a broad liberal arts curriculum.

We seem to be rapidly approaching a society where only advertisers and lawyers will need to think critically, and the rest of us will have to content ourselves with the subjective appreciation of their persuasive abilities.

But then English majors can content themselves with Keats:

"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,—that is all

Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know."

Wintertime safety and maturity

I am writing to the student community to reaffirm the message from Amherst College's President Pouncey and UMass/Amherst's Chancellor Duffey regarding the critical need to cease the annual first snowfall snowball fight "tradition" between students of the two institutions.

As Dean of Students, I am adamantly and unequivocally opposed to any type of activity that results in the destruction of property or physical harm.

Experience has shown that the risk for injury from this "tradition" is high. I'm sure there is no one within either student group who wants to be the victim of someone's unacceptable behavior, as happened last year with a student almost losing an eye.

All students have an obligation to assist in maintaining a safe and civil environment. The first step is not to participate in this activity.

If you do decide to participate, you risk being identified and subjected to disciplinary action in accordance with Code and Student Conduct policies.

The winter season is a fun and enjoyable time. My wish and goal for you is safety and health. I hope you will join me in ensuring safety and health for everyone.

"OH, LOOK— IT'S DONALD TRUMP'S EGO!"

Call representatives now!

Stan Rosenberg

For the first time in months, Massachusetts public colleges and universities have a chance to turn back the huge wave of budget cuts and tuition and fee increases. Intensive lobbying and letter-writing campaigns by students, faculty and staff and a series of public protests have made it clear that the future of the University of Massachusetts is in jeopardy.

Our message has hit home. But our struggle isn't over yet. A tax package being debated this week by the House of Representatives is absolutely critical to our success.

I urge every in-state student at UMass to call home today and enlist their parents in the effort to win the support needed to approve this controversial tax package.

I was successful in amending the $300 million "savings plan," with a Declaration of Public Higher Education Emergency. Through this declaration, the House of Representatives put itself on record in recognizing the serious situation facing Massachusetts' public colleges and universities.

The House expressed its commitment to "restoring necessary funding to the public system of higher education" and to "developing long term solutions for the continuance of excellence in public higher education for all students, faculty and staff."

The leadership of the House of Representatives is now struggling to win passage of a major tax package. If approved, most of the money raised through increased taxes will be needed to wipe away the state's budget deficit. After that, there may be as much as $100 million remaining to restore funding to some critical programs.

Obviously, the fight over how to spend that money will be intense.

With the Declaration of Public Higher Education Emergency, I am pushing to restore $25 million in funding for public colleges and universities. That is nearly a quarter of all funds available for restoration.

The next two days are critical. Winning passage of a tax package in the House of Representatives will be extremely difficult. The thousands of letters and calls from students, faculty, and staff have undoubtedly helped build pressure, but most state legislators continue to hear from an angry majority of their constituents who are strongly opposed to any increased taxes.

In fact, some constituents have contacted other legislators this week calling for more funding for public colleges and universities but no new taxes. This is just not possible.

Without a tax package, we will not beat back the latest $25 million cut to public higher education.

On Thursday and Friday, the House of Representatives is slated to debate the tax package.

I urge every in-state student to call their parents tonight and ask them to call their state representative to tell them it's time to stop cutting and start rebuilding our nationally-recognized system of public higher education.

The actions that you, your parents, and your friends take over the next two days couldn't be more important to the future of the University of Massachusetts. The students, faculty, and staff at our public colleges and universities can continue to play a major role in restoring fiscal sanity in Massachusetts.

We still have a chance.

But to win, we must act now.

Secret confessions of a 'Smithie' wanna-be

Darren Garnick

Although many alumni will swear to their graves that it will never happen, Smith College — the all-women's private liberal arts school — will eventually award undergraduate degrees to men.

Co-education is inevitable: not if but when. Granted, Smith is a tenacious institution and will be one of the last all-women's schools to succumb to our masculine charm. But succumb, they will.

Unknown to Smith President Mary Maples Dunn, three male scouts from UMass, using the Five College system as a cover story, have been snooping around the Northampton campus testing the hostile climate. The scouts, posing as students in a social psychology class, are representative of the three kinds of men at UMass — blondes, brunettes and redheads.

I am one of those scouts.

Admittedly, venturing into Smith territory for the first time was intimidating. Women rule the sidewalks there. Gangs of them crowd the walkways and if you happen to be going the opposite direction, too bad. After getting knocked into the street a few times, I realized people felt threatened by my masculinity, and were determined to suppress it.

The only other men I saw on campus were dragging cement blocks around a construction site. Witnessing the treatment of my fellow brethren, I wondered if I, too, would be forced to do menial labor.

I also feared signs like "Men, Keep Off The Grass!"; "Water Fountain For Women's Use Only!"; and "No Men Beyond This Point Without Female Escort!"

Female UMass students roam freely around Smith without arousing suspicion. But a man may as well hang a neon visitor sign around his neck. He cannot hide or vanish into the background. Teachers notice when he is not in class.

In transit to the library or to class, paranoia sets in. Will I be stopped and asked to show my identification papers? Do I need a visa?

Psychology Professor Fletcher Blanchard, a cult hero among the Smith faithful, and a fellow male, confirmed that male feelings of isolation are an obvious result of an all-women enrollment policy. Blanchard referred to the concept of "Numeric Minority Status" — i.e., the fewer men there are on campus, the more likely people are to notice you are a man, and treat you accordingly.

Contrary to my unfounded paranoia, men are treated fairly at Smith. The attitude seems to be that men are okay as long as there are not too many of them.

In a desperate ploy to feel accepted, I wrote a letter to the Smith Sophian — the campus newspaper — inquiring about a possible staff position. Realizing that a male writer may spark controversy at Smith, I made it clear that I was willing to use my initials or a pen name for a byline.

Editor in chief Laura Begley did not even dignify my job request with a response. Apparently, the Sophian only grants asylum to defecting female columnists.

I have invested endless hours of studying for one semester at Smith — almost half as much time Barbara Bush spent here — to prove a young kid from UMass can handle the academic punches just as well as a Smith student. Yet, regardless of my grades or attitude, I can never achieve "Smithie" status.

Sure, I can pretend to blend in. I could let my hair grow out and wear extra long sweatshirts. I could CONFORM. But why bother?

Despite my dedication to the Smith ideals, my efforts will never be recognized by the Smith administration. I will never share the joy that Nancy Reagan, Gloria Steinem or Julia Child felt when they recieved their Smith degree. It is too late for me.

The day the gender tide changes at Smith cannot come too soon.

Look who's in a half-decent movie

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Correspondent

It would be so easy to give a scathing review of any movie that stars John Travolta and features the voice of Bruce Willis speaking the thoughts of an adorable infant. Problem is, Look Who's Talking is just too damn charming to viciously tear apart.

Kristie Alley, from TV's Cheers, is a top notch accountant who gets down and dirty with married client George Segal. She's a career woman looking for love, he's a slimeball art-deco nut looking at every pair of legs that pass him by. Alley's unexpected pregnancy seems to be the answer to her prayers to finalize Segal's divorce, but his wandering eyes and groping hands make her think twice.

Enter good guy John Travolta, the New York cabbie who brings her to the hospital to deliver. Travolta takes a liking to the baby and offers his services as babysitter while Alley cruises the town looking for the perfect father candidate.

Writer/director Amy Herkerling doesn't come close to matching the form she had in 1982's Fast Times at Ridgemont High but she still serves up enough laughs to keep us entertained. She approaches the material with a light style that keeps the film held together nicely, preventing it from becoming too cutesy. Her relaxed, almost carefree handling of the film is what generates most of the film's charm.

The performances of Alley and Travolta compliment Heckerling's style toe-to-toe. Alley sheds her sexually repressed persona from Cheers and brings a real sense of warmth and almost childlike innocence to her character, which makes her an enjoyable presence to watch.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Travolta is just as appealing. His good-natured performance makes up for the two-dimensionality of his character. He and Alley work well together and bring a nice, casual feel to the film when they're on screen.

Bruce Willis, who was brought in later to provide the baby's voice-over thoughts, deserves credit for his comic timing. Even though Willis is genuinely funny, Heckerling's script is grossly unbalanced, relying too heavily on the voice-overs to provide the majority of the laughs. It leaves the other characters underdeveloped and stuck in the position of setting up Willis for his one-liners.

Despite such incredible drawbacks, the film manages to satisfy on a purely entertaining level. It's simpleminded stuff, but if taken for what it is, it passes off as a relatively enjoyable night at the movies.

Post-production problems have forced Paramount to delay the release of Robert Towne's long awaited Chinatown sequel, "The Two Jakes. Originally scheduled for release last week, the detective thriller, directed by and starring Jack Nicholson, won't be released until January at the earliest. Paramount isn't too happy since the change in dates disqualifies the film for Oscar considerations this year.

Tower Theater is offering a special They Came From the 50s showcase this week, showing six films that exemplify the 50s schlock genre. Tommorrow through Sunday night brings She Creature and Dragstrip Girl. Monday and Tuesday night, "Invasion of the Saucermen and It Conquered the World is screened. Saving the best (or worst) for last, Sorority Girl and Shake, Rattle and Roll are shown next Wednesday and Thursday night. Bring a date.

Blossoming band gets mission accomplished

By LIZ JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

The Innocence Mission
The Iron Horse
Monday, Nov. 27

If you happened to stroll into the Iron Horse on Monday night, you were undoubtedly taken aback by the most unique, sweet vocals that have been produced in a while, as The Innocence Mission, the intense and emotional band from Lancaster, Pa., thrilled the audience with their angelic music.

"I always wanted to have something visual that the audience could grasp," said lead singer/keyboardist, Karen Peris of the band's name. "The Innocence Mission makes me think of a big house, innocent and alone."

Peris certainly grabbed the audience with her ethereal voice and her incredible range. Her husband and guitarist, Don Peris, along with bassist Mike Bitts and drummer Steve Brown, provided the perfect mix to play up Karen's stunning vocals.

The band began by singing two songs, "Curious" and "Black Sheep Wall," from their mature, self-titled debut album.

After "Black Sheep Wall," the band's first single, Karen, in her shy and sweet voice, said, "Thank you very much. When we saw the Black Sheep Cafe here in Northampton, we had to go in and get stickers and menus because of our 'Black Sheep Wall' song. Sorry, I'd pass some around, but I didn't get enough."

The band also played some new songs, "John" and "Strawhouse," that may appear on their upcoming albums. These songs continue the band's heartfelt tradition.

Their songs, dependent on mood and atmosphere, are not planned in any way. "We don't sit there and say, 'This is how the song is going to go, and the music goes this way,'" said Karen. "We just write what we feel like, and then all come together and play."

Don enjoys playing the songs live. "It lets us see how people react to the songs, but more importantly, how comfortable we are playing them," he said.

The audience, who could not get enough, brought the band back for two encores. Rejuvenated with the thought that there might just be singing angels out there somewhere, the crowd left with happy faces.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Gear up for constructive changes. If you press for what you want, you will probably get it. Use your wiles on your romantic partner. A happy discovery will buoy your spirits.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A secret supporter promotes your cause. You make rapid gains in both professional and personal areas. Ponder romantic issues carefully.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Sort out your goals from those of your associates; they could be quite different! Travel possibilities lend allure to a work assignment. Review tax and insurance matters.
CANCER (June 21-July 22): Set the day's agenda early in the morning with the aid of your partner. Planning together is the principal ingredient of a happy union. Something wonderful could take place this evening.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Count on a full schedule to keep you busy today. Refuse to let others waste your valuable time. If you have symptoms of illness, see your doctor. Get more sleep.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A flattering letter delights you. Curb a tendency to be extravagant. A change of personnel could put you in line for a nice promotion. A great time to form new partnerships and alliances.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Summon your strong will power today. An enthusiastic approach to your work will help you make career gains. Higher-ups evaluate your performance. Apply yourself more diligently.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): New business deals prove lucky. Refuse to either penalize or give preferential treatment to a friend at work. Postpone a lunch date until you have more information on the subject you intend to discuss.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Expect some surprises today. Others act out of character. A joint investment could prove profitable. count on a new romance to sparkle. Strangers are unpredictable.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your financial fortunes improve. do not take chances on the road; fasten your seat belt. A mediator may rule against you unless you stick to the truth when making your case. Get expert advice.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Impulsive moves are lucky if you follow your intuition. Learn from another's mistakes. Your charm brings a potential foe around to your point of view. Watch out for someone trying to tie up your money.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A money shortage only makes you more inventive. Go all out to impress an authority figure. You can find real bargains when shopping at outlet stores. Romantic partner deserves another chance.

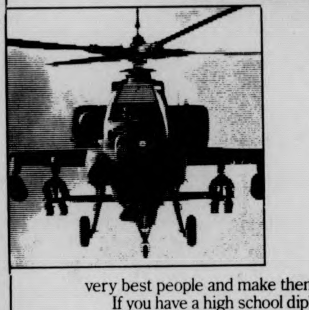
THE ARMY HAS THE FIERCEST HELICOPTER IN THE WORLD...



It can see in the dark. And attack without being seen. It can strike like lightning. It's fast, smart and mean.
But the AH-64 Apache helicopter doesn't fly by itself. It needs trained aviators capable of handling its awesome technology.
Warrant Officer Flight Training takes ability, dedication and commitment. It's an intensive 40-week training program designed to take the very best people and make them pilots.
If you have a high school diploma, preferably two years of college and can complete Basic Training, we just might have a flight suit your size.
To find out if you qualify for Warrant Officer Flight Training, see your local Army Recruiter today or call for details.
...AND WE WANT TO TEACH YOU HOW TO FLY IT.

award the past two years. "She's competing the best I've ever seen her," said LaFreniere. "She's been running unbelievably. It's highly probable she'll break the UMass mile record this year."

Meldrim was the team captain and MVP for Clarence High and swept the New York State Sectional Championships in both the 1500-meter and the 3000-meter, with times of 4:45 and 10:15 respectively.

Freshman pentathelete Colleen Anderson will compete in the 55-meter hurdles, high jump and shot. She placed third in the Pentathalon in the New York State Track and Field Championships and was a Section II Champion in the 100-meter hurdles, 400-meter hurdles and the high jump.

Freshman Rachel Castriotta specializes in throwing events and will be competing in the shot put and 20-pound weight. This will be her first time competing in the weight. She has put the shot 35 feet and has captured third place at the Minnesota TAC State Track and Field Meet in that event. Both Castriotta and Anderson will be making their college competition debut this evening.

Senior Tina White will also throw the weight. She has previously set the UMass school record, which was broken last season, and looks to pick up where she left off by breaking the newer record.

"We're looking for both Castriotta and White to qualify for New England [Standards] at this meet," said assistant coach Jim Giroux. "We see them later placing in the ECAC's as well, whose records are a bit higher." The New England Standard for the 20-pound weight is 38 feet 6¼ inches, whereas the ECAC Standard is 45 feet¼ inches.

"We'll continue training through this meet," said LaFreniere. "Fitness-wise, we're in great shape. We've got a very young team, with talented, experienced leaders. This season should prove to be very promising."

Tufts is led by three sophomores, Adam Silverman, Mike Ingardia, and Mark Bobbin. All three qualified for the Division III National swim meet. Bobbin was named All-American as well.

"Mike Incardia is probably the best of the three," said coach Yarworth. "He could give us some trouble."

Coach Yarworth is planning on getting a good look at his team, to find out just how much depth he actually has.

"I might place some people in other events to see how well we do," said Yarworth. "I'm glad we're in a position to do this. It will give us a good idea for the rest of the season."

Today's meet could give the Minutemen a strong idea as to what they can expect from themselves for the rest of the season.

"I'm pleased with where we're at," Yarworth continued. "We have a lot of work ahead of us, if we're going to be at our best."

Lowell shows Minutemen who's the Chief

UMass loses 70-69 in season opener

Senior center John Tate eyes the basket as he shoots a critical free throw late in the second half against Lowell. Tate missed the shot, and the Minutemen lost 70-69.

By GEORGE AUSTIN

When a basketball team loses a game by one point, it can only shake its head. But when a team misses 13 free throws in such a tight contest, it can only blame itself.

The University of Massachusetts men's hoop team could only blame itself last night after it dropped a 70-69 debacle to the University of Lowell at the Curry Hicks Cage.

It was not exactly an Academy Award winning performance by the Minutemen in their season opener as they made just 19 of 32 foul shots. "This tape is going to be like a horror film when we go down to watch it," UMass coach John Calipari said.

Best actor goes to guard Jim McCoy, who after leading UMass in scoring one year ago, went 1-14 from the field last night in front of 3,666 people.

"I was rushing my shot a little bit," McCoy said.

The Chiefs shouldn't exactly get the best review either, after hitting just 10-21 from the charity stripe and 28 of 61 from the field. But when a game is as close as this, it is usually the team that wants it more, that wins.

"They just came to play and we didn't," UMass guard Rafer Giles said.

Lowell took the lead, 62-61, when guard James Smith tossed in a runner in the lane with 5:22 left in the game. UMass forward John Tate had a chance to tie the game with 41 seconds left and the Minutemen trailing, 69-67. But Tate missed the front end of a one-and-one, giving Lowell the ball with the shot clock shut off.

With the Chiefs trying to ice the clock, Tate was forced to foul forward Liam Scully with 21 seconds left. Scully hit the first free throw but clanked the second, giving UMass another chance.

Freshman forward Harper Williams elected to go for two though nailing a little turnaround in the left side of the paint, cutting the lead to 70-69 with nine seconds left.

UMass guard Cary Herer then fouled Lowell guard Howard Holley with seven seconds remaining and UMass called timeout. Holley missed his free throw but UMass lost control of the ball and time ran out. Division I UMass had lost to Division II Lowell. The Indians won this fight in wild western Massachusetts.

"We talked to our kids and we said that there was never a better opportunity for an upset," Lowell coach Stan Van Gundy said. "We can't have a better win than that, to come in and beat an Atlantic 10 program."

The positive aspects for the Minutemen were that this loss was not a conference game and there is plenty of time to work problems out before UMass plays Rutgers on Jan. 4 at the Cage.

"The good news for us is that we got beat," Calipari said. "We're the 10th place team [in the conference] right now."

UMass led at halftime, 37-31, despite its 13-of-38 shooting from the floor and sloppy play. The Minutemen had problems getting its running game going though and its halfcourt offense just was not enough to apply the knockout punch.

"It seemed like everybody was playing in slow motion," UMass forward Tony Barbee said. "We were just sluggish. We didn't play like we have been playing."

Their next game isn't until Saturday. In the meantime, UMass can chew some popcorn and think about yesterday's loss.

Women's track to open season at Dartmouth

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's indoor track team begins their season with a non-scoring invitational at Dartmouth College tonight at 6. The harriers will approach this invitational as a stepping stone, a practice and performance in one. And head coach Julie LaFreniere couldn't be more anxious.

"We've been working hard since September," LaFreniere said. "I think we're strong in everything. We've got some starting kinks to work out yet.

"We've done some baton work, but we haven't worked on our starts and our jumpers don't have their steps, yet that is what these meets are for."

This is a low-key meet for the Minutewomen. The First Chance Meet at Dartmouth, and other non-scoring meets like it, is an opportunity to work out those kinks and compete for New England and ECAC qualifying times and distances.

The cross country team finished the fall season strong, coming in second in New England. "This season they performed the finest running I've seen in ten years," said LaFreniere. She is eager to initiate the melting of "a good distance crew" and "a lot of strong freshmen."

Two distance runners competing this evening who won't be in Saturday's meet are senior Shana Smith and freshman Maureen Meldrim, who haven't competed since Nov. 11. Smith and Meldrim will be running both the 800-meter and the mile.

"Both have excellent records coming off a strong season," said LaFreniere. "Unfortunately, because of family obligations, they and junior Laura LaVallee won't be competing at the New Hampshire Invitational [Saturday]."

Minutewomen look for first win at BU

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

One way or another somebody is going to go home with their first W tonight.

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team (0-1) squares off against Boston University (0-2) tonight at BU's Case Gym. The tip-off is scheduled for 7 p.m.

UMass is coming off a 72-69 season opening loss to the University of Vermont. BU has dropped its first two games, losing to Dartmouth 64-50 and James Madison 60-50.

"BU is very similar to Vermont," UMass coach Kathy Hewelt said. 'They're quick, young, and they press all over the place."

The Terriers will come out in a three-guard offense against the Minutewomen. The guards will be 5-foot-11-inch senior Tia Theriault, 5-foot-5-inch senior Marjorie Haney and 5-foot-8-inch sophomore Shannon Breslin. In the front court coach Christine Basile (UMass '77) will call on 6-foot-1-inch senior Lynne Ranando and 5-foot-10-inch senior Lynn Bay.

Ranando and Theriault are the leading scorers in the young season, averaging 12 and 11 points per game respectively. Against JMU, Ranando came through with a monstrous game, getting 18 points and bagging 16 boards.

For UMass the starting five will remain the same. Hewelt will go with Michele Pytko and Patty Robak in the back court, Helen Freeman at center and Sue Serafini and Keyburn McCusker at the forwards. That gang of five accounted for all of the UMass' 69 points against Vermont.

If the Minutewomen hope to win tonight they'll need greater production out of the bench. Gloria Nevarez, Kim Kristofik, Lisa Hair, Lisa Ireland and Jenny Moran all shot a combined 0-for-8 from the floor. Hewelt can ill afford another night of goose eggs from her reserves.

"Our starters played well 80 percent of the time," said Hewelt. "And Jenny Moran played very well off the bench."

And the rest of the bench?

"The bench has learned a lot from the first game. That experience should help us against BU," she said. "The second time out should be better."

In addition to the bench play, UMass will need a much better effort defensively to bring home a win. In 29 games last year the Minutewomen surrendered 70 points or more nine times. Already they are one-for-one this season.

"That's the first thing we need to improve on [defense]," said Hewelt. "We need to pick up our intensity."

Hoop notebook: Oops, this sportswriter incorrectly named Helen Freeman a co-captain in yesterday's basketball preview pull-out section. No offense to Freeman who is a fine player (she recorded 18 points and 14 rebounds in the opener), but the other co-captain in addition to Sue Serafini is junior Keyburn McCusker . . . Injury Update: Trish Riley, out with an inflammation above her right hip, began some light exercise this week. She can now ride a stationary bike. "We're bringing her along very slowly," said Hewelt . . . UMass signed one prep player during the early signing period two weeks ago. Hewelt signed Shawna Pemberton, a 5-foot-7-inch shooting guard out of Indianapolis' Lawrence Central High School, to a letter of intent. Pemberton averaged 17 points, 4 assists and 4 steals last season and was named All-Metro, All-Conference, All-County and honorable mention All-State.

Minutemen to race Tufts

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

After coming off an emotional victory over the Boston College Eagles, the Minutemen are ready to swim past their counterparts from Tufts University. This evening's meet is the home opener for the Minutemen, and is scheduled for a 7 p.m. start at the Joseph R. Rogers pool in Boyden Gym.

Tufts is a small Division III school which has been on the Minutemen's schedule for years. This is Tufts opening meet of the season, and were quite successful last year with a 7-3 mark. One of those losses was a 158-85 shellacking at the hands of the Minutemen. Tufts is under the direction of coach Don Megerle, who was named Division III New England Coach of the Year last season.

"Our goal is to swim well," UMass head coach Russ Yarworth said. "We're a little tired, we've been swimming hard the last day or two, but I don't expect to lose."

House to debate tax plan today, tomorrow

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

A tax package that is expected to increase state revenues by $626 million over the next six months and restore $45 million to the state's budget, is slated for debate today and tomorrow in the House of Representatives.

One quarter of the restoration funds, or $10 million, is earmarked for public colleges and universities, Rep. Stan Rosenberg, (D-Amherst), said yesterday.

If the proposal passes, it will be effective immediately, and will span the remainder of fiscal year 1990 and 1991, he said.

"This package is a direct result of months of negotiating and [House Speaker] Keverian is fully behind this," Rosenberg said. "It is a step in the right direction."

Under the proposal, the most recent cut to public higher education would be reduced from $25 million to $15 million, he said.

"It would be up to the individual college or university to decide how the remaining $15 million in cuts will affect students," he said.

Student Trustee Eric Nakajima said yesterday that the University of Massachusetts has already decided to institute a fee increase to meet the cuts.

The restoration package also includes a two percent increase in sales taxes, a rise in capital gains taxes of 2.5 percent, and increases in the sales tax of utilities and cigarettes.

There will also be an increase in gasoline tax. The monies from this increase will be channeled toward the repair of roads and bridges, Rosenberg said.

"Five-hundred and eighty-one million dollars will be put toward fixing the state's deficit," he said.

The restoration package was proposed by a group of 20 legislators concerned with recent blows to the budget after months of negotiation.

Provost probes charges

Profs questioned about class cancellations

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

The Provost's office is investigating a few University of Massachusetts professors for possible contract violations after they canceled classes during the recent student strike.

Provost Richard O'Brien said last night he sent letters to the professors one week ago notifying them of the complaints, which came from students, parents and state representatives. He added that the number of complaints was "not large."

O'Brien refused to identify the number and seriousness of the complaints.

"I don't want to discuss details," O'Brien said. "When it's all over I'd be happy to. My first thing is to check out whether the allegations are correct."

Political science Professor John Brigham said he received a letter from O'Brien on Monday. The letter read: "I have received a complaint asserting that you have failed to offer at least one of your assigned classes, presumably in sympathy with the boycotting action of the undergraduates . . ."

One of the student complainants, sophomore Eugene Danielle, said Brigham canceled his Introduction to Constitutional Law class on Nov. 16 in support of the strike. He claimed Brigham asked students who showed up for the class to leave.

"There were some of us who wanted the class held, and we resent the fact that we were forced to leave," Danielle said. "I wanted Brigham to know that not everyone was on strike."

Brigham, who called the student strike a "great effort," said he did turn students away from his class, but made all class notes available to students on Monday. He said he did not want to penalize students for not being in class.

"By asking students to leave, I

Avant Garage to air in Student Union

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Staff

If you walk by the televisions in the Student Union Building near the ballroom and the Hatch around noon today, you will be able to see the Union Video Center's latest creation, "Avant Garage."

Avant Garage, an hour-long program involving original video art and comedy written and produced by UVC members, is the brainchild of students Phil McNamara and Bob Berger. It has developed into an artistic product of the students involved with the project.

"It is about time for exciting programming done by students," Berger said.

Starting today, Avant Garage will be a bi-weekly event. Berger said UVC also hopes to expand Avant Garage to the cable stations next semester.

"The purpose of Avant Garage is to be exciting, shocking, and to get students motivated to become involved with video production," he said. "We are striving not to be average and ordinary. Diversity will make it good."

Berger said more students will become interested in video productions if UVC shows exciting works written

Senate condemns O'Brien's investigation

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted unanimously last night to condemn Provost Richard O'Brien's investigation of professors alleged to have canceled classes during the recent student strike.

Led by Robert Fadel, student attorney general, the senate said O'Brien's actions are an attempt to "break community unity," and called for a halt to the inquiry.

One week ago, O'Brien sent letters notifying the professors of complaints lodged against them by students, parents and state representatives.

In the letters, O'Brien states that the contract between the University and the Massachusetts Society of Professors does not allow for work stoppages or the withholding of services. He asked Brigham and other professors who received the letter to respond as to whether the complaint was valid.

O'Brien said he expects the professors to respond and said he will review the replies. He said the number of letters sent is "not large."

"I think students who were not taught [during the boycott] have a right to be upset," O'Brien said.

Fadel, who introduced the motion, said his political science professor, John Brigham, received a letter from O'Brien notifying him of a complaint that he had canceled class.

The letter states that O'Brien received a complaint that

Activist recommends a balanced view of the world

By DAVID ALLEN FORRESTER
Collegian Correspondent

It is important for people to balance awareness of positive changes in the world, like those taking place in Eastern Europe, with a knowledge of unhealthy practices that still threaten the planet, Greenpeace activist Christopher Childs told more than 100 people in the Student Union Ballroom last night.

Childs said the recent movement toward democratic reforms in Eastern Bloc nations is cause for optimism within Greenpeace, an international organization known for its confrontational, yet peaceful approach to preserving the environment and working to stop the threat of nuclear war.

"Recent events in Eastern Europe are reminding us how fast things can change and how fast they can change for the better," he said.

But Childs, who has been lecturing at colleges and universities across the United States for the past two years, said the work of Greenpeace requires that people understand the negative aspects of the world, too.

An accompanying slide show presented the work Greenpeace has done to stop the killing of whales, dolphins and other sea animals. Childs also spoke about Greenpeace's actions against pollution, like hanging banners from smokestacks and nuclear power plants, among others.

Greenpeace was founded in 1971 as a movement to stop nuclear testing, Childs said. Although it is well known for its marine animal and environmental crusading, he said a large part for the organization is defined by the second syllable of its name — "peace."

There is still a great deal to be accomplished in the areas of ocean ecology, pollution, and stopping the threat of nuclear destruction, he said. But, the size of the problem has to be balanced with the possibilites for change.

"There are good, fine people who have worked in the environmental and the peace movements," Childs said. "They have worked hard, for years in some cases and they have burnt out because they got wound up in the magnitude of the problems."

Childs said it is important for everyone to picture the way they want the Earth to be.

"It has to do with vision, really," he said. "Activists who burn out have lost that "inner vision" because they can only focus on the problem, he said.

He said people do not need to support Greenpeace in order to help the goals of the organization. Even people who disagree with their tactics and oppose the group agree wiht its ultimate goals, Childs said.

"I have never met a soul who disagrees with the vision that's written in our name; a green and peaceful planet," he said.

GLB Program helps to fight homophobia

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

The first in a series of articles introducing the gay, lesbian and bisexual groups on campus.

At a university that is a "microcosm of the real world," the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns offers services to help meet the needs of these communities at the University of Massachusetts.

The program is one of three full-time programs addressing the needs of gay, lesbian, and bisexual students on campus, said Felice Yeskel, who founded the program in 1985.

"People have picked up a lot of misinformation about homosexuality," Yeskel said, "If they meet gay, lesbian or bisexual people who seem like everyone else, a lot of times their prejudice decreases."

The program is often used as a national referral for information on gay, lesbian, and bisexual life and has assisted other colleges in establishing similar programs, Yeskel said.

In addition to its extensive library of books, journals and videos, the program sponsors a series of events each year, including Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Awareness Week, a film series that has been running since September. The program also commissions speakers to help fight homophobia on campus.

The program has networked with other campus agencies in order to deal with homophobic behavior and discrimination on campus, which Yeskel said is still "highly prevalent," despite the efforts of various campus groups.

"If there was no homophobia and heterosexism, the need for a program like this wouldn't be necessary," she said.

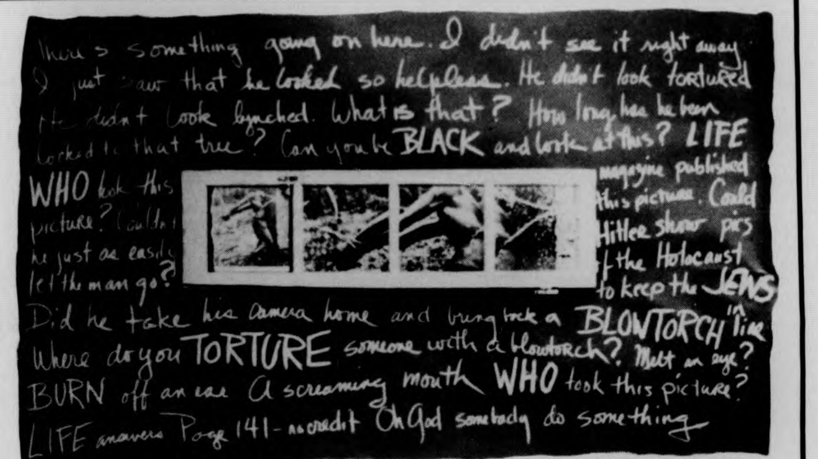
The program also offers training and consultation for other campus agencies such as divisions within Student Affairs and the Collegian in order to prevent or reduce homophobia.

The program was originally established in the fall of 1985, after a series of homophobic incidents during the previous semester led gay students on campus to present a list of demands to the administration, Yeskel said.

As a result of Yeskel's report, titled "The Consequences of Being Gay: A Report on the Quality of Life for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Students at the University of Massachusetts," the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns was established as a pilot program. It was formally instituted in the division of Student Affairs in 1988.

Yeskel said an increase in course sections dealing with homosexuality would help to combat homophobia.

"It would be nice if you could take a history course and find out the history of the gay, lesbian, bisexual liberation movement or and English course that told you Walt Whitman was gay," she said.



There's something going on here. I didn't see it right away

Car accident causes $3,000 damage

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

A two-car accident on Commonwealth Ave. Monday caused $3,000 worth of damage after a motorist changed lanes without warning, police said.

Police cited a driver of a vehicle traveling north for improper lane change after the driver swerved into the right lane and collided with a second vehicle. No injuries were reported.

In other police reports:

LARCENY

- A female resident in Moore Residence Hall reported Tuesday that her leather jacket was stolen from her room. The loss was estimated at $300.
- The owner of a vehicle parked in Lot 34 reported Tuesday the theft of a CB antenna. The loss was estimated at $75.
- A man reported his license plate stolen from his vehicle parked in Lot 22 yesterday.

ARRESTS

- Police arrested David C. Williams, 21, of Springfield, for operating after suspension and driving an unregistered vehicle after he was stopped for speeding Tuesday on Massachusetts Ave.

VANDALISM

- A man reported yesterday a scratch from a key had damaged the length of his vehicle parked in Lot 22. Estimated damage: 500.

MISCELLANEOUS

- A Northeast Area resident reported Tuesday receiving numerous annoying phone calls over the past few weeks.
- A faculty member reported Tuesday finding pry marks on two office doors in Thompson Tower.

Women's Studies combats Asian stereotype

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

"The prevailing image of Asian women in the media today is as sex toys," University of Massachusetts student Sharon Park told an audience of about 60 people in a presentation yesterday in the Campus Center.

Along with Lisa Chang, Kim Han, Kim Fountain, and Lisa Tung, Park performed a reading of poetry and essays titled, "Suzy Wong Doesn't Live Here Anymore: Perspectives on Amer/Asian/American Women's Realities," as part of the UMass Women's Studies Brown Bag Lunch Series.

In an introduction to the presentation, Park stated that two main stereotypes of Asian women exist in the Western world: "the evil, conspiring Dragon lady," and the "exotically sexual, fragile Lotus blossom."

The name of the performance is derived from a work called, "The World of Suzy Wong," in which the main character is a submissive prostitute who serves American GIs.

In a section of the performance called, "Once I longed to be White," the cast addressed the feelings of inferiority and alienation they experienced while growing up under the shadow of the "ideal woman" perpetuated by the media. The performers spoke of their desire to "change their skin like a chameleon," and "squeeze into a stereotype that doesn't fit."

Also discussed was an American history class in which students were taught that former presidents George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, and writer and inventor Benjamin Franklin were "all-around good guys," but that American Indians were savages, Blacks were slaves, and Chinese people built railroads.

A piece entitled "Gramma" addressed Asian-held prejudices against other groups. In this section, a girl asks her grandmother "What if I don't marry Asian?" Her grandmother responds, "If he likes our food, speaks our language, and would be a part of our family — okay. Just don't marry Black."

National pro-choice conference to be held

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

A national conference offering strategy planning sessions for pro-choice political activists will be held this weekend at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge.

The conference, scheduled for Saturday and Sunday, is titled "A Battle for Reproductive Rights — Where to Next? Strategies for Mass Resistance." The event is sponsored by Refuse and Resist, a Boston-based activist coalition.

Marci Lew, a co-founder of People for Choice at the University of Massachusetts, is scheduled to speak at the conference.

"A goal is to organize to see what we can come up with to put anti-abortionists on the defensive, and to come up with a more long-term agenda for a national strategy on abortion," Lew said.

Speaker: debt, drugs plague Latin America

By WILLIAM FLEISHMAN
Collegian Staff

Two of the most pressing problems currently facing Latin America — debt and drugs — were addressed in a lecture by a University of Massachusetts alumnus in Memorial Hall Tuesday.

Leonard Horowitz, an internal affairs consultant to several Central and South American countries, said these two problems are inhibiting the social and economic development in these areas. He also warned that these problems could easily affect the United States.

"Some of these problems can easily apply to the U.S.," Horowitz said. "We have to approach the situation in Latin America with humility and modesty."

According to Horowitz, the debt problem arose in 1973 as a result of the Arab-Israeli war when the Arabs raised the price of oil worldwide. As petroleum-using nations, Latin America required loans from international banks to cover the costs of the imported fuel.

By 1982, the debt crisis in these countries became critical, with a combined total of $231 billion owed to international and national creditors. Over the past seven years, that amount has almost doubled to $418 billion.

"Their debt is our problem also," he said. "The inabilities of Latin American countries to buy goods from the United States has hurt us. Twenty to thirty million job opportunities have been lost."

This year, the Bush administration has implemented a program to cut the principal and interest of loans granted by the United States as a form of debt relief. However, the government has been having a difficult time convincing U.S. banks to acquiesce to the cuts.

Horowitz claims that the only effective way to solve these economic problems will stem from interior policy reform in Latin America.

"The governments of these countries will have to develop programs that will encourage internal investors," Horowitz said. He added that once money is generated from within, foreign investors would follow, which will lead to economic growth.

Horowitz continued to say that next to their increasing debts, the drug situation in these countries is their greatest social and economic problem.

"Narcotic trafficking in Latin America wears down the economy very much like how a person gets worn down from drug use," he said.

The money from drug trafficking is diverted from aiding national economic growth to a few aristocratic drug lords, Horowitz said.

In some areas such as Columbia and Peru, a great deal of money goes to paying and arming guerillas to protect drug farms, he said, adding that this type of illegal trade has severely damaged the morale of these countries.

"Development is the answer," he said. "If development occurs, there will be less drug-related jobs. The government needs to make policies to ensure stability of the economy."

Horowitz received his bachelor's degree in Latin American studies at the University of Massachusetts in 1949. After completing his graduate work at the University of Pennsylvania, he has since been working with several governments in Central and South America.

Do we live in a "true" democracy?

The recent "spread of democracy" throughout Europe (East Germany, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia) has brought some interesting reactions from the United States and its citizens.

Minu Sebastian

Most of our leaders including President Bush have been implying that the United States is somehow responsible and has encouraged these changes. Most citizens are very supportive and excited about the changes in Europe and also have a greater sense of pride in the United States.

How responsible is the United States for the democratic ideologies that seem to be spreading throughout Europe? Are we an adequate role model when it comes to "democracy" and "freedom"?

This past Monday, in Springfield, three people were cleared of sedition charges. Richard Levasseur, Richard Williams and Patricia Levasseur were accused of being in a conspiracy to overthrow the U.S. government.

Defense attorneys have claimed that this case should have never come to trial. On TV, news reporters have claimed that the government was acting as "thought police" while making these accusations.

These people seem to have been tried for their thoughts or beliefs. How can we call ourselves a democracy and advocate such oppression?

The thought of our government controlling the thoughts or beliefs of any person should send fear and anger to anyone who consider themselves American and who truly believe in democracy and freedom of expression.

It was not too long ago that there was a great deal of talk about an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting flag burning. Again our government has shown how undemocratic and oppressive it can be.

While many called flag burning unpatriotic and un-American, it is truly un-American to prohibit one's freedom of expression whether it means burning your own flag or waving it in a parade. Our government seems to be threatened by any point of view which could put into question their actions or that actually make people think about what's going on around them.

When I think of democracy, I associate it with freedom of expression and, of course, the First Amendment. One cannot exist without the other. In order to have a democracy we need to preserve our freedoms (of thought, speech expression, etc.).

It is absolutely vital for First Amendment rights be protected in order for individuals to develop themselves to the fullest. In a true democracy, people should be allowed to experience and express different points of view. Otherwise, we cannot become mature and responsible citizens.

How can citizens use their power in a democratic society 18(such as voting) without completely developing their beliefs?

Many people often wonder why many Americans are apathetic and refrain from voting in many elections. Could this at least be partially due to the lack of communication between our legislature and its citizens? And if this is true, then doesn't this indicate a form of oppression where people aren't developing into informed and responsible citizens?

Our government is responsible for ensuring and advocating a society where people can develop their minds to the fullest.

We can achieve a better understanding of ourselves, other people and foreign nations if we are exposed to and allowed to think about different points of view. In a true democracy, differences will be accepted and valued.

Without the tolerance of critical thinking and dissenting points of view we become repressed and controlled. Our repression is not as blatant as some communist nations, instead it exists in subtle forms such as the recent sedition trial and the flag burning controversy.

The time has come for the United States to examine its own notions of "democracy" and "freedom of expression" before attempting to help other nations.

Back to our wallets, Part Two

We've been duped!

We slapped our money down at the ticket counter not realizing we were taking part in the latest Hollywood sham to squeeze money from our pockets. Even paying student prices on a near-desolate Monday night served as little consolation. We were duped!

Josh Galitsky

A couple of friends and I went to see Back to the Future — Part Two the other night. All I can safely say is that it was an experience. We were sucked into an evening of seemingly mindless comedy and came out feeling like we had sold our wallets to Universal Pictures.

First off, let me warn you right away that if you didn't see the first one you simply won't have a clue what is going on. Even if you did see it, there is no guarantee that you will have a clue anyway. It's a very complicated movie. And once you're in it, there really is no escape but to see it to the end. It will take more than one night and six bucks to do it because that's the set-up. It ends in a cliff-hanger . . . purposely. Confused? You ain't seen nothin' yet.

Back to the Future — Part Two, unlike other movies, doesn't pussyfoot a possible sequel. It comes right out and shouts it by showing coming attractions for the sequel to the sequel at the end of Part Two. It was like a TV episode that would keep me on edge for a week wondering if Fonzie could make the jump over the killer shark. To be continued . . . are the three worst words in the TV vocabulary. Now they've hit the movies.

The movie itself is wild. The twists and turns of the plot are so sophisticated and often frustrating that a manual should be given out with the price of admission. Christopher Lloyd (Doc) spends most of the movie explaining everything through neurotic sometimes ridiculous dialogue. He even breaks out a chalkboard to illustrate to Michael J. Fox (Marty McFly), (and those of us scoring from our seats) what is going on.

One of the really amazing things about this movie is that it meshes scenes we never got to see in the first flick with scenes that we did see, only this time we are seeing them from a totally different perspective. There are a million things happening at once but when you know exactly what Marty needs to do at a given time, it gets exciting and suspenseful. If you don't, you'll have a headache with Excedrin written all over it.

Another feature that makes this film interesting is that it makes us look closely at ourselves. Consumerism reigns in the future, which is both humorous and frightening. Things like Nike shoes that wrap themselves at the push of a button and Hologram advertising seem like strangely realistic possibilities. If you think we are over-stimulated now, check out 2015. There is even a nostalgia shop that makes us laugh at what we are today (or at least what we were in 1985 when the first film came out).

This movie will become a new trend in filmmaking. Filming two or three sequels at the same time will become the latest thing and eventually it will become commonplace. Whether you come out of this flick amazed with the Spielberg flair, mad at the movie industry and society, or simply wondering what day it is, you will know for sure you have experienced something very different from just another night out. Perhaps if I could have seen into the future I would have gone to see National Lampoon's Christmas Vacation instead.

Discrepancies about Amherst College

Several discrepancies regarding Amherst College have arisen recently that warrant correction:

Contrary to previous assertions, Amherst College does not employ anyone as a lobbyist in the Massachusetts State Legislature.

Assertions that Amherst College, a member with UMass/Amherst of the Five College Consortium, would lobby for cuts in state funding to public higher education is absurd.

To my knowledge, the cuts are distressing to everyone here at the College, including the president, who has publicly said so.

The University Health Services is indeed the provider for Amherst College students.

However, medical care is provided to Amherst College students strictly on a fee-for-service basis, with the prices deliberately set to avoid subsidy.

Thus, Amherst students' utilization of University Health Services actually helps the University to absorb fixed costs.

Comic strips are lacking in content and purpose

To those of you who were wondering:

I AM NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR "JIM'S JOURNAL."

I'm not sure whether to take this as a compliment, an insult, or what. But when this feeble attempt at a comic strip debuted in this paper about a month ago, everyone who knows me (and even a few people who don't, and just felt like blaming it on me) asked me, "Are you the one who draws that stupid cartoon?"

Some have even gone as far as saying, "It looks like something you'd draw — right along your talent level."

Thanks — I think.

I suppose I'm not one to be considered an authority on this subject, especially since I was one of the few people in the world who actually understood "Yeasthead."

But I understand the need for comic strips in a newspaper, which is one of the reasons I have never bought a copy of the New York Times in my life. In this world of strikes, protests, etc., there are more than a few uptight folks who could use a little kick of comic relief in the pants.

First, a little background, if you will.

"Jim's Journal" is drawn by a guy (whose name isn't really Jim, either) who is trying to get syndicated. So he's sending samples to newspapers across the countrv, in hopes that some cigar-chomping executive in a high-rise building somewhere will actually like his work.

From the looks of things, he wouldn't get many votes of confidence around this campus.

Not to exclude "Jim's Journal," it seems like there are more and more of these types of comic strips flooding the pages. Blame it on "Bloom County," I guess. Everything was great when Bill, Milo and Opus were still around.

Jim Clark

But then Berke Breathed gave it up, and everything went to hell.

Check out the rancid drawings that papers like the Boston Globe have used to replace "Bloom County." Like "Dilbert." Yo, folks. Is this not a rip-off of "Garfield" or what?. A nerdy owner and a cynical pet. Except that this is drawn with all of the artistic flair of a first-grader. And what's the deal with the tie? Why is this Dilbert guy's tie always flipped up?

I suppose we were due for a letdown. After all, the recent flood of new comic strips brought us "Calvin and Hobbes," and "Robotman," — both classics. Every one can't be a Rembrandt. But this is getting ridiculous.

Comic strips are supposed to have a point, or at least make sense. Take Tuesday's "Jim's Journal," for example. The last frame read, ". . . Steve looked at me like he didn't know what was going on."

That's good. I'm glad I wasn't alone.

Occasionally there will be a strip or two that will go over our heads. Fine. But when half the people in the world are asking, "What is this all about?" that's when we have to wonder.

Then again, the same holds true for people who try to read too deeply into comic strips, saying they are sexist or things like that. Gary Larson, the artist who draws "The Far Side," included in his latest book a whole section of cartoons to which people, in his opinion, took offense. Tried to analyze something that wasn't intended.

The basic purpose seems to be defeated here, which is to make people laugh. That's what comic strips are for, right? Right?

OK, you say, "why don't you give it a try? If you think you're so smart, why don't you try to draw a comic strip."

Well, a couple of friends of mine and I gave this some thought, and came up with our own version of "Jim's Journal." As expected, it got rejected.

I guess it wasn't stupid enough.

Back to the textbooks for a lesson in government

The Nov. 30 issue of Rolling Stone features an interview with Grateful Dead guitarist Jerry Garcia. Among the topics discussed are Ken Kesey's acid tests, the Dead's most recent recordings, Garcia's drug history, and various aspects of socio-political theory.

Cosmo Macero Jr.

Garcia makes one point that I found quite interesting, and a bit disturbing. Asked whether he votes, he said: "I don't feel there's anything to vote for yet. Constantly choosing the lesser of two evils is still choosing evil."

It's interesting in that it is a unique approach to political apathy. It's disturbing in that it makes sense.

I'm continually burdened by a sense of hopelessness each time I attempt to size up our government. Once a proud symbol of democracy, and an effective administrator of capitalism, our two party system has become a crude caricature of its initial self. How can we have confidence in legislators who must have the importance of education spelled out to them? Why are we forced to be so vocal just to let our lawmakers know that we are an important segment of society, and that we do care?

As a registered republican with a libertarian viewpoint, I must question the organization of this state's GOP — a party that could very well have nominated one of the top five most corrupt democrats in the history of Massachusetts to oppose Gov. Dukakis in the upcoming gubernatorial election. For what? Revenge perhaps? A man with half the wits and IQ of Ray Shamie could take the race. Ed King's name should never have been mentioned.

I also must question the democrats, both of this state, and the nation as a whole. Can a political party exist under such circumstances of chaos and disparity? Are the development of an efficient budget, an effective and economical defense, and the continued support and administration of vital social programs the prime issues at hand? Or must we stand witness to the bloated egos of our Ted Kennedys, the sad reality of our Dukes, and the confused rhetoricism of our Jesse Jacksons?

Democracy was conceived as a system of choice, and it's becoming apparent that the opponents of a quality, equal society are choosing each other. The wealthy go out to the polls. The wealthier run for office. And the wealthiest make sure they win. (Please, no garbage about the republican party being comprised of the rich and elite. Those days were gone when Truman was in office, and back then, Ronald Reagan was a democrat.)

We really need to go back to to the high school textbooks for a lesson. The 26th Amendment, ratified in 1971, over a period of three months (the fastest ratification ever) set the voting age at 18. In addition, it protects Black voters against discrimination, suspends literacy tests as a qualification for voting and provides a uniform 30-day residency requirement for voting in Presidential elections, protecting the right of individuals to move freely from state to state. Guess who signed this baby. That's right . . . Richard Nixon.

In short, getting out to vote is slightly easier than waiting in line at the bank. But the Garcia question still remains. Why vote for Satan just because he's wearing a pinstriped suit? Just look on Beacon Hill. Lynn, Lynn the city of sin, was Raymond Patriarcha Billy Bulger's next of kin? How about that, Kevarian? Sorry about the flowers, Georgie. We'll deposit the check in your account at D'Angelo's. Tsongas? I just don't think he cares. The Duke? . . . Oh yeah, and what about Capitol Hill . . . I think I've got a case of the United States blues.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

The most important and informative fact of the semester to appear in this space: Undergraduate and Graduate applications for the curriculum fee waiver for Spring 1990 will be available in Financial Aid Services, Dec. 4.

The office will be closed on the 5th for FAFs mailings, but I have it on good word that someone will be outside the office to help anyone out.

You should at least try to get one, even if you don't receive Fin-Aid, because the new fee does change your status. Also, remember if anyone in your family is now unemployed, is disabled or has passed away, definitly appeal. Fin-Aid is here to help, whenever possible. I can attest to this.

Now for the stupid idea from the Administration of the week. There is a farm next to campus which is for sale. Normally a little more elbow room would be nice, but since the State has already taken care of this, eliminating some of the elbows around here, we oughta consider using the money for some other purposes.

The bill for this farm is going to be about $2.4 million. That's a lot of money.

The money will be coming from a fund that is set up to invest in real estate for the University. But since the administration controls the money, I believe, don't you agree we should save things like the Japanese department?

Just something to think about.

I was in my Bio of Cancer class yesterday and we had this guest speaker. He was a guy who had overcome a variety of cancers, including one which he was suppose to died from . . . in 1977.

Rarely do any of us get to hear such simple and inspirational talk about life. The man took the time to tell us, or better yet remind us, to live for the present because the past is "a canceled check" and the future hasn't arrived yet.

Life is such a short time, and there is so much to do, to see, hear, smell, taste and feel.

He reminded me of my favorite time of year here at UMass. Late spring when the baby ducks are born and they are running all over the place. It is so simple, yet beautiful.

I haven't felt so relaxed in a very long time.

Wasn't Thanksgiving nice? It was time to spend with our families, reminiscing about the past. Now we all remember why we don't go home every weekend.

I must say that the worst part of Thanksgiving break is the shoppers after the holidays. I grew up in Boston, I learned to drive there and know where I am going.

Shoppers from the suburbs generally grew up in the suburbs, learned to drive there, and couldn't find their way from Fenway Park to Kenmore Square.

New winter traditions of peace

As winter rapidly approaches, it brings with it a set scene for the annual "tradition" of the snowball fight between UMass and Amherst College. Of course, most know this tradition quite well: the first significant snowfall prompting students to congregate outside the dorms with the intention of walking across town, pelting the lesser number of Amherst College students with a barrage of snowballs.

To me, this sounds like a pretty good time. Amidst a beautiful winter-white setting, students get a chance to revel in the tradition of college rivalry in an inherently fun and ideally harmless activity we've all enjoyed since our youth.

Last year, as many of you know, an Amherst College student was severely injured in the snowball fight. I sure know, that person was me.

Reality begins to settle in as you are profusely bleeding or as you are being told after emergency surgery that there is a slim chance you will ever see again out of an eye damaged by a "loaded" snowball.

Ideally, I would like you, as a student body, to realize this through me and my experience, and to instead encourage endeavors such as the very commendable Christmas carolers who initially came over to our campus. Gestures such as this are an indication of positive, constructive thought.

Amherst College has gone out of its way to make sure its students are not involved in a snowball fight this year. So even if people do come over, they will likely find no one to play, except maybe the police forces.

At the University, you take pride in verbally and visually demonstrating your disagreement with issues and forces that tend to deprive one of their rights. A demented snowball fight has taken away my right to ever see normally again and has created destructive hatred between two schools that need to grow off of each others presence.

Please take this same demonstrative spirit and energy and channel it toward the implementation of a higher good of peaceful and positive relations between neighboring schools. I can then only thank you deeply.

Serious racial innuendos

On Nov. 18, Dr. Frances Cress Welsing presented her Theory of Color Confrontation and White Supremacy. Those who expected a scholarly discussion of racism were disappointed. Instead, they heard innuendo, and selective and creative use of fact and fancy.

Among her many revelations, Dr. Welsing claims: Whites are the albino offspring of African tribes who were banished to Europe. The White man's return and oppression of Africa is the revenge of these outcast children on their hard-hearted ancestral parents. Because of their outcast lineage, Whites secretly wish they were Black. This subconscious desire is ritualized by sunbathing, and drinking dark liquids, such as coffee, tea, and Coca-Cola. White skin is genetically recessive (sic). Therefore, it is only a matter of time before Whites disappear from the gene pool. Instead of exiting gracefully, the Whites have turned to global domination and oppression of people of color as their only means of genetic survival.

This is particularly important because White women secretly want to sleep with Black men. This is acknowledged by the White woman's description of her ideal mate as tall, dark, and handsome, her preference for black clothing when she wants to look sexy, and her pleasure in receiving chocolate-covered nuts in heart-shaped boxes symbolic of scrotum.

White males are in awe of Black genitalia and its genetic prowess, and acknowledge this through the assignment of large brown balls to the manly sports of football and basketball, and small white balls to the wimpy sports of ping pong and golf.

White males don't consider themselves to be real men until they have slept with a Black woman. That's why they play golf, so that they can sink their white balls into "big black Mother Earth."

The real reason the Nazis hated the Jews was because Jews are "half Black." Evidence for this is in the term "Semite," the root of which Dr. Welsing takes to be "semi" (half), ergo, "half Black."

If Dr. Welsing were a stand-up comic, her revelations would be funny, but she is serious. This seriousness is made plain by her numerous innuendos against Whites. She implicitly states that the AIDS epidemic, starvation in Africa, Black urban violence, and the drug problem are part of a White holocaust against the Blacks, that only Whites can be racist, and that Whites are genetically and morally inferior to Blacks.

Despite this racist perspective, Dr. Welsing was surprisingly well received by her audience, which goes to show that we are not yet color-blind to the origin of ideas.

Protesting — pure Americana

It's a funny thing about Americans, always the first in line to applaud demonstrations for democracy in other countries, but always the first to criticize those who exercise this right here in our own country.

America is probably the only country in the world where it is considered unpatriotic to protest.

Imagine, for a minute, that you are sent back to the years of the American Revolution. The first thing you see is a group of citizens screaming at the British troops who are occupying the colonies. Cries of imperialism ring out.

But if you listen to the conversations of most people, they are not supportive of the protesters.

"Don't they have anything better to do?" "Commies." (This guy was ahead of his time.)

Some are heard to be talking about the guerilla theater which took place on a ship in the Boston Harbor the other day. (Something about dressing up as Indians and dumping tea into the water. How silly.) Others are ready to find Thomas Jefferson and lynch him. After all, he was advocating one of these revolutions every ten years. Imagine.

Push it ahead about 60 years, when people are beginning to agitate about the traditional American practice of slavery. The Grimke sisters, and the Blackwell family. (What the hell are they doing out of the kitchen?)

If these people would just be patient and try to work through the system like everyone else. For God's sake, stop talking about revolution!

Let's skip the 60s, shall we? I mean, how much can we take of this M. L. King fellow? Civil disobedience, I'd like to show him some civil disobedience.

And if I ever catch that Hoffman fellow, I'll tell you what I'm gonna do. I'll, I'll . . . I'll cut his hair, that's what I'll do.

Cuz I just can't stand it when people do more than just talk about democracy. Some people actually want to practice it.

If people actually found out that we have a closed political system (remember, there are only two parties, count 'em) they might take to the streets and hold large rallies with hundreds of thousands of people. Then what would we do?

We might have to become a democracy. But then again, what are the chances of people in America actually understanding that protesting is as American as imperialism and apple pie?

MUA shoots for $20,000 with telethon

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

This Saturday marks the start of the 7th Annual WMUA Telethon. Celebrating its 40th birthday, the student-run station, located at 91.1 on the FM dial, hopes to earn a record-breaking $20,000 this year.

RADIO WMUA
UNIVERSITY · OF · MASSACHUSETTS · AMHERST

The telethon, which begins at noon on Dec. 2, and runs until 8 p.m. Dec. 9 (culminating with the 10th Annual Polka-Thon), has become a vital source of income for the station over the years.

"We've come to rely more and more on the telethon," said General Manager Becky Zumbruski. "The majority of our funding comes from the Student Activities Trust Fund, but that money is divided up among hundreds of other groups, which makes it hard to survive on that alone."

"Our revenue is really low," explained Telethon Coordinator Phil Straub. "The Board of Governors is in the process of eliminating vending on the Campus Center Concourse, which means we've got a solid chunk of revenue to make up for this year."

"Without the vendors, we'll be short at least $100 to $200 a month," added Zumbruski.

As usual, premiums are available for those listeners who pledge, and because this year marks WMUA's 40th anniversary, the premiums available are more special than they have been in recent years.

Mugs and t-shirts that display the WMUA 40th anniversary logo are available, as well as "Blues Greats" calendars, and gift certificates from various area stores.

"For a pledge of $100, one DJ is offering a listener the opportunity to program their show," Straub said.

Also needed this year, are volunteers to help with such tasks as answering phones and stuffing envelopes.

"Volunteering gives the listener an opportunity to meet their favorite DJ and learn how a radio station operates," said Straub. "For those interested in giving us a hand, just come down to the station and sign up, or give us a call and I'll call you back."

Funds collected during telethon week are applied towards making repairs and buying equipment such as turntables and a new CD player.

"The public sector may not realize that a station's stereo and electronic equipment needs to be replaced more quickly than it normally would," Straub explained. "We have been using the same equipment for the last twenty years and we use it 24 hours a day. We're surviving on Superglue and Scotch tape."

"We've been without an engineer for almost a year, which means we've also gone without a lot of necessary repairs," Zumbruski added. "Without telethon funds, we'd be down to one turntable and one person running the show."

Culminating the event, is the 10th Annual Polka-Thon extravaganza, which begins at 6 a.m. on Saturday, Dec. 9, and continues until 8 p.m. that evening.

"The Polka-Thon brings in a large amount of funds," said Straub. "It features different DJs every hour, special guests and surprise celebrities."

Following the Polka-Thon, DJ Billy Belina hosts a polka dance from 8:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m. at the Polish American Citizen's Club in Ludlow. "The dance will feature the New England All-Stars, and a portion of the proceeds will benefit WMUA," Belina said.

Over the years, mainly because outside funds have become so scarce, the annual telethon has become more of a mainstay for the station.

"Professional non-commercial stations have telethons three to four times a year, which gives them the opportunity to collect more funds," Zumbruski explained. "We have one telethon a year, and it happens to fall right before Christmas, which for most people is an extremely hectic time. Those not involved with the station directly may not realize it, but student and community support is vital to WMUA's survival."

Frehley hits few aces with latest five card dud

Trouble Walkin'
Ace Frehley
Megaforce/Atlantic

I have three copies of Kiss Alive. My cassette, my sister's album and my brother's 8-track (he's kinda old). No offense to current Kiss ax wielder Bruce Kulick, and maybe just a little offense to perma-pucker poseur Vinnie Vincent, but as far as I'm concerned, the standard Kiss discography should end somewhere before Unmasked, and therefore, before the departure of Ace Frehley.

After stripping the paint from his face, Space Ace took a plunge into the ruthless solo arena. Frehley's Comet had their moments, but there were too few of them, and the band's third LP, last year's Second Sighting, was testimonial.

It was a great idea. It wasn't a great band.

Ace has re-grouped, dropped the Comet and put forth a new solo effort, Trouble Walkin'. There are several points of interest on this album worthy of mention: [1] Peter Criss lends a hand with vocals and percussion on a few cuts, marking the first time in 10 years the two Kissmates have worked together. [2] Frehely's guitar work is the cornerstone of the LP. Not surprisingly, a good deal of the vocals on Trouble Walkin' are tiresome and formulaic, but Ace holds his own on the strings, much to the benefit of some of the weaker material. [3] Production legend Eddie Kramer (along with bassist John Regan), twisted the knobs for this one. Kramer is largely responsible for the tonal excellence of classic gems like Zeppelin's Houses Of The Holy and Hendrix' Electric Ladyland. His hourly fee must be huge.

Frehely penned seven of the album's 10 tunes. The

All star Roach to jazz up Saturday night blues

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff
and PETER SOKOLOWSKI
Collegian Correspondent

The Jazz All-Stars concert, held every December, is one of two great UMass traditions centering around jazz, the other being July's Bright Moments Festival. This year's Jazz All-Stars concert takes place this Saturday at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center concert hall. The concert usually features a performance by master drummer and part-time music faculty member Max Roach, plus a set by another featured performer, and this year is no exception.

This year, like last year, Roach will perform solo. A solo drum performance, you say? Well, get those images of your most hated heavy metal band's bombastic smoke-bomb delight out of your head right now. This is Max Roach, the father of modern jazz drumming.

He got his start in the historic quintet of Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie in the 1940s that gave birth to bebop. In the following decade, he took the music a step further in the quintet he co-led with ill-fated trumpet prodigy Clifford Brown. He linked jazz up with the Black Consciousness movement in 1960 with his We Insist: Freedom Now Suite album, and later with "The Dream – It's Time," in which his thundering drums accompanied Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech.

Valley Jazz

Since the 60s, Roach has been a consistent innovator. He has played duets with such daring "free" musicians as Cecil Taylor and Anthony Braxton; his Double Quartet (which appeared at 1987's Jazz All-Stars concert) paired the jazz quartet with the string quartet; his M'Boom Percussion Ensemble explored the commonality of percussion sounds from around the world.

Roach's solo performances represent his attempt to establish a repertoire for solo jazz percussion (analogous, for example, to the repertoire for solo violin in European classical music). He doesn't just bang away; he plays compositions that contain every element of jazz, including "heads," thematic improvisation and even a sense of melody. Even at age 64, he is the most musical drummer alive.

Roach is a living, breathing and playing embodiment of the African-American musical heritage. The same can be said of trumpeter Clark Terry, whose trio will perform the other half of Saturday night's concert. Terry learned his craft in St. Louis during the late 1930s and early 40s. In 1947, he broke the color barrier by becoming the star of Charlie Barnet's fiery big band, and then breezed through an audition with Count Basie, the man who personified big-band swing. When Basie was forced for economic reasons to pare down to an octet, he chose Terry as his only trumpeter.

Terry entered the pantheon of jazz trumpeters in 1951 when, at the recommendation of Barnet, he joined Duke Ellington's band. Here, Terry really came into his own, lending his uniquely rich tone and bubbly approach to such features as "Perdido." His position and timing in Ellington's group was perfect: by 1956, the band had reached new levels of creativity and popularity. As more attention fell on Duke, more fell on Terry, leading to his appearances with the Brown/Roach group, Dinah Washington, Thelonious Monk and others during the late 50s. He made his first recordings as a leader at this time as well.

By the end of the 60s, Terry had settled in New York City. He played in various big bands (including his own), formed a fruitful quintet with trombonist Bobby Brookmeyer, and unveiled his latent talent as a blues singer. Since then he, like Roach, has been sharing his first-hand knowledge of the music as an educator. To quote Duke Ellington, Clark Terry is "beyond category."

With these two masters, this Saturday's Jazz All-Stars concert should be a real treat, especially compared to last year's lackluster performance by the Jazz Legacy Ensemble. As icing on the cake, the proceeds from the show go to the Fletcher Henderson Memorial Scholarship, which finances the (increasingly expensive) education of a jazz major at UMass each year.

■ Ace Frehley

title track may be the strongest, combining solid arrangement with a nice chorus (Sebastian Bach, Dave Sabo and Rachel Bolan from Skid Row lend a hand on the record too). In fact, all kinds of studio hacks jumped in for some action on this album. Drummer/percussionist Anton Fig shares the skin duties with Sandy Slavin and Criss. Richie Scarlet backs up Frehely on guitar, and Keel's Marc Ferrari co-wrote "Five Card Stud."

"Shot Full Of Rock" starts the first side with a nice staggered, jumpy riff. "Do Ya" is a high octane cover of the Electric Light Orchestra hit, and encompasses some of Frehley's best fret burning to date.

But it's the simple, bluesy "Remember Me" that shines brightest here. Ace's sticky, slutty playing and groveling vocals are throwbacks to early Ted Nugent, circa "Great White Buffalo," "Hey Baby," and "Free For All." It is in this song, within the most basic I-IV-V chord progressions, that Frehely throws a good punch in the gut. His string bending and finger vibrato is just enough to grab hold of you, without dragging on endlessly. Overplaying isn't a problem, nor even a factor here.

RECORD REVIEW

There are problems however.

Ace is dancing around the 40-year-old plateau, so he has no business fooling around with garbage adolescent stuff like "Too Young To Die" or "Back To School." Just because Skid Row contributes a few howls, doesn't mean he should be influenced, at least not so noticeably.

Whereas Kiss found their place in the rock world by not taking themselves too seriously, many younger bands today err in that they have no sense of humor. There's an old saying regarding musical quality: "If they could really play, or had something to say." To be honest, as a band, Kiss satisfied neither requirement, but they were still fun.

As an individual, Frehely certainly can play. It is only when he grasps for more that he falters. His only real struggle is to keep things in perspective. There's nothing wrong with tearing it up through a few 100 watt Marshalls and ranting on about cold gin, warm girls and hot cars. I believe that's called rock and roll.

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Wait a while before reintroducing an old idea. Stay in close touch with a longtime friend. Your career may take a back seat to family duties. A financial windfall is possible.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Bank more money, even if your deposits are small. You should think twice before booking travel plans. Tackle tasks with vigor, then reward yourself for a job well done.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Enjoy the privacy you have early today and use it to outline an interesting program of work. Seek legal advice before signing contracts. An out-of-court settlement works to your advantage.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A visit or telephone call will result in much good will. Take time out to run an important errand. The personal touch will work wonders! A message mix-up could disrupt a special relationship.

LEO(July 23-Aug.22): Adopting a more relaxed attitude will help you make the right decisions. To avoid embarrassment, double-check the details of a project. A chance encounter could lead to renewal of an old relationship.

VIRGO(Aug.23-Sept.22): You are driven by impulse rather than reason today. Recognize your limitations and you will do just fine. Romance enjoys highly favorable influences. Financial worries are relieved.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct.22): Use subtlety to get what you want. A casual get-together with friends will make this a memorable day. A good time to approach someone about a job or financial backing.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A promising relationship needs more time to grow. Someone could be confused by too much advice. Be mindful of what kind of example you set for a child. A financial situation is better than it seems.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec.21): Travelers could encounter problems today. Confirm your reservations. A family relationship improves. Make the best of a difficult situation. A close friend comes through for you once again.

CAPRICORN(Dec.22-Jan.19): Expect changes in the workplace. Do your research diligently and you will do your work more efficiently. Take advantage of a golden opportunity to increase your knowledge.

AQUARIUS(Jan.20-Feb.18): Self-improvement projects enjoy highly favorable influences today. A discerning newcomer could play a major role in your future. Follow up a stockmarket tip; you could reap a tidy profit.

PISCES(Feb.19-March 20): The newspaper could give you an important job lead. Follow up! Revise your resume. "Brown bag" your lunch to save money. Offer to take an older person to the doctor or grocery store.

MassPIRG to give Clean Air Quiz

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Staff

A Clean Air Quiz will be administered by MassPIRG, an environmentalist group on campus, from December 4 to 5 on the Campus Center Concourse.

The quiz will contain questions on topics such as waste incineration, automobile emissions, and global warming.

A fact sheet with answers to the questions and suggested actions that students can take will be handed out after taking the quiz.

The student with the highest score on the quiz will be awarded a prize.

"We want to arouse people's awareness and activate them by writing a letter," said Bonnie Sammon, the co-chapter chair of the clean air project.

Sammon said students could write a letter to state Sen. Keating, chairman of the Steering and Policy Committee.

The Massachusetts Clean Air Bill is currently in the House and, if enacted, would reduce the amount of auto emmissions to a more environmentally sound level. The bill also mandates regulation of the amount of toxic chemicals released into the air by companies.

Sammond said she expects about fifty people to take the quiz during the two-day time span.

motivated them into asking 'What am I doing [in class]?'" he said.

According to Article 23 of the professors' contract, union members cannot "call, cause, assist, encourage, participate in, condone, ratify or sanction, nor will any bargaining unit member engage in a strike, work stoppage, slowdown or withholding of services during the term of this Agreement."

John Cole, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors Faculty Union and a key figure in the strike, said Brigham did not violate the contract and called him "admirable."

"He didn't engage in the strike and he didn't encourage the strike," Cole said. "With my reading of the contract and [Brigham's] explanation of why he did what he did, I don't feel he violated the contract . . . in the sense of a contract because he provided notes for his students."

and produced by other students.

Much of the video's material consists of satirical vignettes. Avant Garage pokes fun at the politics involving the budget cuts, Gov. Dukakis, the City of Northampton, and the Collegian, he said.

All of the material is written and produced by students. Some of the material was originally done in film in years past by UVC students, but has been transferred to video for Avant Garage, he said. Music by local bands is also used in the program.

Berger said using camera and film to create an art form on video is much easier for UVC, because video costs much less than working with film.

THE ARMY HAS THE FIERCEST HELICOPTER IN THE WORLD...

It can see in the dark. And attack without being seen. It can strike like lightning. It's fast, smart and mean.

But the AH-64 Apache helicopter doesn't fly by itself. It needs trained aviators capable of handling its awesome technology.

Warrant Officer Flight Training takes ability, dedication and commitment. It's an intensive 40-week training program designed to take the very best people and make them pilots.

If you have a high school diploma, preferably two years of college and can complete Basic Training, we just might have a flight suit your size.

To find out if you qualify for Warrant Officer Flight Training, see your local Army Recruiter today or call for details.

...AND WE WANT TO TEACH YOU HOW TO FLY IT.

Brigham had failed to hold at least one class, "presumably in sympathy with the boycotting action of the undergraduates."

Fadel said Brigham canceled class after students voted 19 to 1 in favor of the cancellation. Brigham later provided students with notes from the canceled class.

"O'Brien hasn't acknowledged the benefits of the strike . . . unity and a vast amount of education," Fadel said.

Men's swim team is too tough for Tufts

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

Did you ever have a day where you could do no wrong? Last night's men's swim meet between the University of Massachusetts and the Tufts University Jumbos could qualify as just such an outing.

The Minutemen won most of meet's events, losing only two to the Jumbos. UMass (2-0) literally blew them out of the pool with a dominating 163-80 score.

They're a good Division III team," said UMass head coach Russ Yarworth. "There wasn't as much competition as I had hoped for. They just could'nt keep up with us."

The Minutemen had no trouble getting out of the blocks last night, beating Tufts University at Boyden Pool.

Several swimmers had impressive performances, but everybody contributed as a whole. Senior Brian McIver placed in three events, all of which were victories for the Minutemen. McIver won the 200 yd. freestyle in a time of 1:48.41, an event which happens to be his specialty. The Minutemen swept the event as Scott Reed and John Gardiner took second and third respectively.

McIver also anchored both relay events. The 400-yard medley relay team reeled in a victory with a 3:40.24 time. Along with McIver in the relay was senior Roger Kennedy, and Jay Peluso and Curt Sawin, both of which are freshmen. Peluso is making an early name for himself as he was last week's New England Rookie-of-the-Week.

In the 400-yard freestyle relay McIver and Sawin teamed up with G.T. Ladd and Roger Kennedy to get win in 3:15.01. Peluso and Ladd helped in several other events as well. Peluso won the 200 yard breaststroke in 2:13.34, and took third in the 200-yard butterfly. Ladd, who was the emotional leader of the team, won the 50-yard freestyle in 21.95 seconds.

Tufts was lucky that the score was as close as it was, as Yarworth swam people in off events. Doing this gave him a chance to see how much depth his team has. By the looks of their performance, there is nothing to worry about.

"I'm glad I could get a good look at the team, I'm pleased with what I saw," said Yarworth. "I may do the same thing again this weekend against Springfield."

The only events that the Jumbos came away with were in the 1-meter diving and in the 200 backstroke. The diving competition was Tuft's strong point for the evening. The Jumbos took the top three spots of the six-man competition. Curt Corrogan won with a combined score of 229.2 in the five dive event.

The 200-yard backstroke was won by Tufts sophomore Mark Bobbin. Bobbin is the Jumbos' best swimmer, and participated in the nationals last year.

"Bobbin is a great swimmer," said Yarworth. "He is better than anyone we've got in that event.

"Despite the lack of competition, I'm pleased with our performance," said Yarworth. "I like the direction we're headed in."

Women's hoop stuffed by Boston Univ.

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

Ouch.

You know things are tough when you look at the post-game box score and the only thing you can find that you did well was shoot free throws.

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team lost its second game in as many tries this season, dropping a lopsided 72-46 encounter to Boston University last night at BU's Case Gym.

The Minutewomen were suffocated by the Terriers' defense, managing only 39 shots (compared to BU's 69) and coughing up 24 turnovers against a 1-2-2 full court man-to-man press.

How does one account for only 39 shots in a 40-minute game?

"Turnovers," said UMass assistant coach Mary Vail. "We couldn't get in the flow offensively. And when we did we didn't get good shots."

Despite the aforementioned horrific facts, UMass found itself only down 11 points, 57-46, at the 6:22 mark. But while the Minutewomen were shut out their next three trips down the court BU was getting a three-pointer and two buckets off the press.

"We had it down to 11 but didn't get anything our next few times down," said Vail. "Before we knew it we were out of it."

UMass struggled everywhere but especially in the back court. Starters Michele Pytko (15 points, 5 assists) and Patty Robak (11 points) shot a combined 4-21 with eight turnovers.

"Patty was getting fouled on a lot of her shots, so it was hard for her to get a rhythm," said Vail. "Michele had some shots that she had to force up because the clock was running down."

While Pytko and Robak were missing shots, Sue Serafini was having trouble getting any shots at all. For the game she was 1-for-2 from the floor.

UMass trailed from the get go, falling behind 8-2, 17-6, 21-13 and finally 29-18 at the three-minute mark in the first half. A 9-4 BU run created the 37-22 half time score.

BU was led by forward Lynn Bay. Averaging 6.5 points and 5.5 rebounds a contest, she burned the Minutewomen for 20 points, 12 rebounds and 6 assists.

"That number 31 (Bay) had a real good game. She really hurt us on offense," said Vail.

What did UMass do well?

The free throws, which were a sore point of an exhibition loss against the Amager team from Denmark, were nearly flawless this night. As a team the Minutewomen shot a sizzling 18-21 from the charity stripe (85.7 percent). Pytko and Robak led the way as both went 8-8 from the line.

In addition to the freebies Vail praised the play of the reserves, who obviously logged a lot of minutes in the one-sided affair.

"The bench came in and played real well," she said. "Defensively they played solid.

"As for the five starters, we're not happy with them at all on defense."

Boston University, 72-46

Former Bruins to hit the ice at Amherst College

Will face off with Amherst HS alums in benefit on Dec. 10

Bruins coach Mike Milbury will join a host of former teammates for a benefit game Dec. 10 at Amherst College.

By JOHN SUTTON
Collegian Correspondent

On Sunday, Dec. 10 at 3 p.m., the Boston Bruins Alumni will play at the Amherst College Orr Rink to raise money for the Green B. Williams Youth Hockey Award.

The former Bruins player will play against the 1973 Amherst Regional High School team, which was the Western-Central mass. champion for 1972 and the No. 1 Western Mass. Berry Division team in 1973.

Among the former Bruins players who will be participating are current coach Mike Milbury, John Bucyk, Brad Park, John McKenzie, Don Marcotte, Rick Middleton, Terry O'Reilly, Gary Doak, Ed Sandford, "Ace Bailey," Frank Simonetti, Tom Songin and Doug Keans.

The Green B. Williams Youth Hockey Award was established this year by Carla Williams Rossiter, the sister of the late Green B. Williams, who played goalie for Amherst High in its triumphant 1971-72 and 1972-73 seasons. According to the Amherst Bulletin, his life ended in 1984 in an Air Force plane crash when two T-38 training aircrafts collided.

Rossiter said the intent of the Green B. Williams Youth Hockey Award is to use the earnings from the fund for as many Amherst Hockey Association hockey scholarships as possible each year. Scholarships would pay for ice-time fees, hockey equipment and team travel expenses.

Those eligible for the award are children ages 7-13 from Amherst and its surrounding towns of Belchertown, Leverett, Shutesbury, Pelham and Hadley. Appropriations for awards will be based on academic achievement, attitude and spirit toward playing hockey and not having repetitive delinquent behavior.

Rossiter's goal is to encourage participation in youth hockey by those families who cannot afford to become involved.

"I am attempting to recognize children for the positive efforts in their lives," Rossiter said. "I am delighted that we can help these children participate in this youth activity, and at the same time, recognize them for their exemplary efforts scholastically, good sportsmanship, strong interest and dedication to learning, skating and playing hockey."

Prior to Thanksgiving, 700 tickets had been sold and $6,000 was raised, according to Richard Mathews, a consultant for the scholarship fund and former treasurer of the Amherst Hockey Association. There are still 1,000 tickets available for the game.

Tickets are $10 and can be purchased at Fenton's Athletic Supplies, Louis' Foods, Cowls' Building Supplies, and Blair, Cutting and Smith. Tickets are also available at Sound in Motion on Route 9 in Hadley, Snow's Country Store in Belchertown and H.L. Child's and Son in Northampton.

No tickets will be sold at the door.

Maniacs with a social conscience

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

During the early 80s, amidst the growing popularity of new wave and the expanding hardcore scene, another "alternative" rock circuit was created by those influenced and energized by the roots of country, folk and bluegrass.

From this, 10,000 Maniacs were born. During this period, the band, whose name originated from an old science fiction film called 2,000 Maniacs (they mistakenly thought it was 10,000, hence the name), was performing a mix of reggae, punk, Joy Division and Gang of Four covers, in and around their rural hometown of Jamestown, New York.

Keyboardist Dennis Drew said, "In Jamestown, there was never any music community for us to become a part of or to be influenced by. So we were able to develop in a vacuum and come out sounding like ourselves."

In 1983, 10,000 Maniacs released two self-produced discs on their own Christian Burial Music label — a five-track EP entitled Human Conflict No. Five, and a full-length LP called Secrets of the I Ching. Thanks to BBC DJ John Peel, "My Mother the War," a track from Secrets, became a hit on the British independent charts.

Following a U.K./European tour in early 1985, 10,000 Maniacs entered the studio to record their major label debut, The Wishing Chair, for Elektra Records. Produced by Joe Boyd (R.E.M., Fairport Convention), The Wishing Chair became one of the most critically-lauded albums of 1985.

In July of 1987, the Maniacs released In My Tribe. It was this LP that was responsible for the band's national breakthrough, and the album remained on the charts for months while the band toured, first as an opening act and then as a headliner.

In an attempt to reach a broader audience, lead singer and lyricist Natalie Merchant focused In My Tribe on current issues such as militarism ("Gun Shy"), illiteracy ("Cherry Tree") and child abuse ("What's the Matter Here?"), steering clear of The Wishing Chair's complex historical and literary allusions.

The band's sound "matured" as well; they hired producer Peter Asher, who brought new textures and a wide-screen spaciousness to Merchant's voice. While it's debatable whether this move was really a step in the right direction, it certainly paved the way for the band's mainstream success.

In November 1988, 10,000 Maniacs returned to the studio to record Blind Man's Zoo. Although many Maniacs fans agree that the album lacks the originality of the band's earlier work, Merchant claims, "I believe that there is a vast improvement in both the writing and the performing of the songs contained in this album (Blind Man's Zoo). I'm proud of In My Tribe, but this record reflects our live sound, a goal that we've long wished to attain."

10,000 Maniacs perform tonight at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall along with Ireland's Black Velvet Band. The show starts at 8 p.m.

Uhry's Driving Miss Daisy

By JOHN PATRICK MUSULIN
Collegian Staff

"Driving Miss Daisy" plays tonight only at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m.. This one-act comedy, the first play ever written by Alfred Uhry, won the 1988 Pulitzer Prize for drama.

The story is set in Atlanta, Georgia and is about the 25 year relationship between Miss Daisy, played by Rosemary Prinz, and her chauffer, played by Ted Lange. Fred Sanders plays Miss Daisy's son, an Atlanta businessman.

Uhry's inspiration for the characters of Miss Daisy and her driver were his own grandmother and her chauffer. They were together from 1948 to 1973 and enjoyed a touching, often hilarious relationship.

"I thought about her...the day she was parked in the driveway, thought the car was in drive, took off in reverse, zoomed backward over an embankment, slammed into a garage, and knocked it [down]," Uhry said. "When I thought of the idea, I couldn't NOT do it." His grandmother was not hurt in the accident.

Prinz, known to many as Penny on the daytime soap opera "As The World Turns," has performed in nearly fifty plays throughout the country over the past 12 years. Her work includes "The Glass Menagerie," "Mame," "Gypsy" and most recently, "Steel Magnolias."

Ted Lange also sports an extensive and diverse acting background. His credits include the role of Isaac Washington, bartender on the television show "The Love Boat," as well as parts in classic theatre productions such as "Hair," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Othello." Lange studied drama at the London Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts.

The play is directed by Charles Nelson Reilly. In addition to his numerous appearances on television as a talk and game show personality, Reilly has won a Tony Award for his performance in the Broadway hit "How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying."

"Driving Miss Daisy" became an instant success as soon as it hit the stage. Clive Barnes of the New York Post called it "Lovable" and Kevin Kelly of the Boston Globe called it "An American Classic." It recently celebrated its second anniversary in New York City.

Alfred Uhry has spent most of his life writing music, lyrics and librettos. After spending four years working on his latest musical, "America's Sweetheart," which earned him almost nothing, he decided to try something he had never done before: writing a play.

Uhry sold the screen rights to 'Driving Miss Daisy' and was hired to write the screenplay. The film stars Jessica Tandy, Morgan Freeman and Dan Aykroyd.

He also worked on the screenplay for Mystic Pizza.

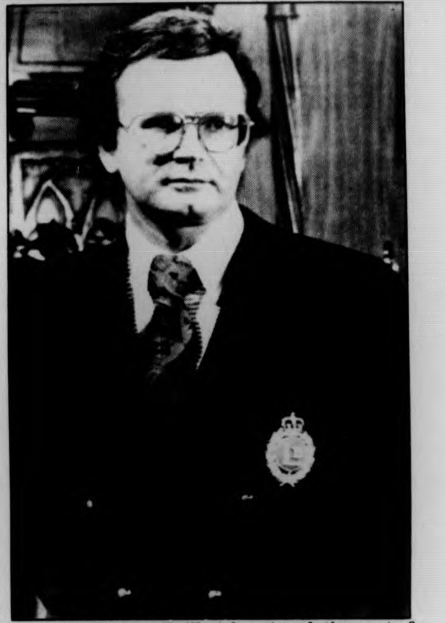
A few tickets for "Driving Miss Daisy" still remain. Prices are $23 and $21. For further information call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511.



Charles Nelson Reilly (above) took time out of his busy game show schedule to direct Love Boat's Ted Lange and Days of Our Lives' Rosemary Prinz in "Driving Miss Daisy"

They're more than a sandwich, they're a meal

By AMIE FINKELSTEIN

When I first heard the name "Minibus Sandwitch," I immediately pictured Volkswagen minibuses with tons of long-haired, tie-dyed hippie kids sporting bell bottoms, love beads and peace necklaces inside. All of them smoking that wacky tabaccy. But it doesn't stop there. It keeps rollin', right in line with some sort of funky folk rhythm . . . Grateful Dead, anyone?

Joke.

What we got here, music fans, is rock 'n' roll,, something that seems to be going out of style with all the new stuff making wave. A Minibus Sandwitch, if you will, deliver honest spirit, community, and raw electric energy of the 60s with the sound and creativity of today's music.

Somewhat of a "classic rock" band, deeply rooted, trying to make a new dimension in music without forgetting where it began, Minibus is concerned with personal expression without being "obnoxiously political." Their musical influences (and their covers) range exactly that combination of styles, with the Doors, Pink Floyd, Hendrix, (and even the Dead) on the outside, and a fresh feeling from the sounds of R.E.M., the Smiths and Jane's Addiction, while remaining an anti-top 40 band.

Minibus Sandwitch was founded in 1987 by the three-wheeling a trio Steve Adoniou, Sean Moloney and Tony Zito, generally playing throughout the crowded UMass dorms. Adoniou covered both lead and rhythm guitars, while Maloney played drums and Zito handled the vocal and bass chords.

The following year, Gerry LeBlanc hopped on the Bus as the fourth wheel/lead singer, and the vehicle began moving down the road, horn blaring through the Pioneer Valley, developing an energetic and original sound.

In the past two years, Minibus has driven through the club scene, including Sheehan's, Katina's and Grover's. They've played UMass numerous times. There outside gigs span the entire Five College area, most recently at Mt. Holyoke College for the Concert for World Hunger, where the Bus raised over $1,500.

Within their expanding audience, there has come a new concept: The Bushead. I have seen this phenomenon. These unique fans have no difficulty following these guys, hitching a ride on the Minibus and filling clubs at concerts.

Minibus has also arranged studio work for an upcoming demo at Flight Path Recording Studio. the demo will include eight of their 30 originals. In the future, they hope to hook up with an independent label that has potential to carry a unique, sophisticated listening crowd.

Despite working with only three instruments (guitar, drums and bass), their songs come across strong, determined and complete. Very rarely do they add another instrument to their set, but on occasion, the Bus has been known to draw in a harp here or there, for the fun of experimenting with new instruments.

Minibus Sandwitch plays tomorrow night at Emerson Hall of Smith College. Check 'em out, and next time you hear their name, you'll know what to think, clear and simple, rock 'n' roll.

Evan Johns and His H-Bombs attack Pearl Street tomorrow night

On the verge of exploding

By KRIS EARLE
Collegian Correspondent

Bombs Away is the title to the new album by the rambunctious group Evan Johns and His H-Bombs. The album is an anthology of wit and rage set in a rootsy rock 'n' roll and country blended medium.

Evan and company's third album contains twelve new selections. Unlike many albums from up and coming bands, the Bombs keep the listeners in tune throughout their miscellany with numerous hopping tracks.

"Love Is Gone," the opening jammer on the album, rips through a twist of bouncy drums, U2ish (Edge) "gitar" riffs and high strung vocals. The song is the album's highlight and contains the classic line, "When you'd gone I'd said goodbye/I should have broke your nose."

Other songs based on the ideas of love not all that it's cracked up to be include the anti-women "All Mixed Up," the easily relatable "Pain Of Love" and the slow slow song about love and life, "Still Feels Good."

The album should also be lauded for its creativity and don home fun mood. "Twister County" is great to gyrate to in its hoedown styled fashion. Prior to the jumpy "Dance, Frannie, Dance," Johns, in his country twang, talks about himself.

"Boudin Man" and "Tired of Trash" are both worth mentioning for their humor and bounciness.

The closing tune, "Poor Boy's Dream," includes an addition and guest appearance of Champ Hood, the famous fiddler from Austin, TX. The song is the most original on the album, as well as the clearest musically and lyrically. Johns' "gitar" playing is sharper than ever, and fellow Bombers Dan McCann (bass), Jim Starboard (drums) and Mark Korpi (guitars) do just as well in their crisp playing. Produced by Garry Tallent of Bruce Springsteen's now defunct E-Street Band, and available on Rykodisc, Bombs Away promises to be one of the more exciting albums to add to your new music Christmas list.

Evan Johns and His H-Bombs are play an 18 an over show tomorrow night at Pearl Street. Curtis T and the Kick open the 8:30 p.m. show.

Cultural cartoons examined

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

A panel presentation, sponsored by the Five College Cross Cultural Studies Network, will examine the role of eastern and western political cartoons November 30 at 8:00 P.M. in 319 Bartlett Hall.

The panel comprised of Sura Levine of Humanities and Arts at Hampshire College, Yvonne Haddad of the UMass History department and Lucien Miller of comparative literature will present "Cross-Cultural Political Cartoons: East and West."

Kathleen Moore, a political science graduate student, will also make a presentation in collaboration with Haddad.

"I plan on focusing on the perception of Arabs in American newspaper editorial cartoons of the 1970's, especially regarding the oil embargo and Arafat," said Moore. "And, of course, we will be speaking about the image of Arabs in the media as part of this."

"We also plan to examine the way political cartoons have over the past twenty years become an advertisement for the editorial it accompanies," she said.

Levine will be speaking on "Orientalism in European Art" and Miller will discuss "19th Century Chinese Caricature of Western Missionaries."

Come on and dance

By RICHARD TOOMEY
Collegian Correspondent

Feet will be flying as the UMass Department of Music and Dance presents the University Dancers, under the artistic direction of Richard Jones, in concert this weekend.

The program opens with Paula Weber's Symphony of Five Women. This particular work opens with an enchanting interpretation of Prokofiev's Symphony Number 1, and explores the fleeting images of dance floor patterns with delicate pointe work.

Following this is a Terese Freedman, Jim Coleman collaboration entitled Isn't It Just . . .. The extraordinary choreography, which uncharacteristically pre-empts the musical score, explores the motivation contrasting dynamics.

One of the more remarkable parts of the program is the dance, The Place. Andrea Watkins developed this unique performance with the absence of music. The entire performance relies upon the internal rhythm of each individual dancer, as well as a certain degree of group rhythm. this type of performance requires tremendous commitment, which is obvious through the mere action of the dance.

One of the final performances of the show's first half is And Then There Were Six, choreographed by UMass graduate, Sue Casey. Accompanied by the music of Stan Kenton, Casey weaves contemporary dance with jazz stock movements.

The second half of the show opens with Terese Freedman's Four Songs, which is set to a variety of medieval music. In vivid contrast, Jim Viera's The Edge makes a unique and bold stab at illustrating the world of contact sports.

The evening concludes with Richard Jones' explosive Jamming, which was inspired by the glorious rhythms of such greats as Charlie Parker, Count Basie and Oscar Peterson.

The performance begins tonight and continues through Saturday. All performances begin at 8 p.m. in UMass Bowker Auditorium. Tickets, available at the Fine Arts Center box office, are $6 for the general public, $4 for students and $2 for senior citizens and children under 12.

Prof questions investigation

d'Errico says professors did not violate strike policy

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Peter d'Errico, a University of Massachusetts professor of legal studies, said yesterday UMass professors under investigation by the Provost's office for possible contract violations may not have violated their contracts during the recent strike.

d'Errico said that in order for the professors to have violated the portion of the contract regarding the strike policy, an actual strike had to occur.

"What students were doing was not legally a strike. It was a boycott," he said. "A strike only occurs when an employee is refusing to work."

d'Errico said because teaching assistants are not recognized by the University as employees, their "strike" was not legal either. Without a legal strike, the professors could not have violated their contract.

"It's a catch-22 situation," d'Errico said. "If UMass acknowledges that graduate students were on strike, they have to acknowledge that they are also employees."

UMass faculty are also prohibited by Article 23 of the Massachusetts Society of Professors contract from slowdown or withholding of services during the term of this agreement.

On the allegations against Political Science professor John Brigham, d'Errico commented that professors routinely deviate from their syllabi, so Brigham's rearranging of his schedule and providing of class notes was not legally "withholding of services."

Brigham was one of several professors who received a letter from Provost Richard O'Brien on Monday, alleging that he failed to offer at least one of his classes "presumably in sympathy with the boycotting action of the undergraduates."

Charles J. DiMare, director of the UMass Legal Services Office, said that he thought it "unusual" for the University to make allegations of work stoppage or withholding of services, considering that graduate students are not acknowledged employees and their strike was not a legal one.

DiMare cited the 1979 Massachusetts Labor Relations case, the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees vs. Graduate Student Employees Union whose decision denied employees status to graduate students.

Panel: changing Europe may mean new confrontations

by NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

The Third World has reason to fear the changing European political economy, community professors said last night.

Speaking after a panel discussion on changes in Eastern Europe, Pavel Machala, a political science professor at Amherst College, said Europe's new entente, or working together, could have serious affects on global relations.

"The Third World should fear a North-South confrontation of the White people of the North fighting the colored people of the South," he said.

Machala said a coalition between workers and technocrats in the West will lead to a more labor-intensive economy in the industrialized nations. As a result, exploitation of raw materials and labor in the Third World will also intensify.

However, Machala said Third World nations could try to prevent the exploitative North-South relationship from worsening by engaging the Western intelligentsia in their struggle. Intelligentsia, or the intellectual class, are more

A Marxism 'celebration' begins

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian staff

Members from diverse academic fields from throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe have come together for a three-day conference at the University of Massachusetts to discuss the traditions and the advances of Marxist theories and current implementations.

Steve Cullenberg, professor of economics at the University of california at Riverside said,"It's really a gala celebration in honor of Marxism. There's quite a bit of excitement involved with Marxism."

He said people don't fully understand the changes it has undergone and will continue to undergo. He said if people guage Marxist thought by what they read in the media, there will always be a false understanding of the modern possibilities it possesses.

The conference has drawn together members of economic, literary theory, natural science, philosophy, women's study, and geography backgrounds, as well as several other areas.

"In Marxist thought, there is a belief there is class structure. That also means people in all different field have a say in how the world works,"Cullenberg said.

The conference has been in the planning stages for about a year and a half. He said it has come together through six months of full-time work on his part and that of many individuals.

According to Cullenberg, the concept for a conference was proposed by the Editorial Board of a newly published journal,Rethinking Marxism, about two years ago. A UMass organization, Association for Economic and Social Analysis, sponsored the event.

The conference, which began yesterday and continues today, is comprised of 57 panels with 244 slated speakers. Discussions will resume today at 9a.m. A fee is being charged on a daily basis. More information can be obtained at the lower level Campus Center information booth.

Weapon found to combat virus

The Associated Press

BOSTON – Injections of the natural disease-fighting protein interferon give doctors their first effective weapon against hepatitis C, a virus that infects at least 150,000 Americans annually, according to a report today.

"In my opinion, this is a major clinical advance," said Dr. Gary L. Davis of the University of Florida.

The work appears to represent another milestone in a year of advances against this elusive virus. Until recently, doctors were

Texas judge's censure draws positive response

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff
and the Associated Press

Legal experts and gay activists at the University of Massachusetts joined others across the country yesterday in applauding the public censure of a judge who said he gave a lighter sentence to a killer because the victims were "queers."

The Texas State Commission on Judicial Conduct Wednesday issued a censure order for District Judge Jack Hampton, whose remarks to reporters in December ignited a year-long storm of criticism.

"The commission finds that Judge Hampton's comments, per se, were destructive of public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary," the order said.

Public censure is the strongest action the commission could have taken short of recommending the removal of the 57-year-old Republican from the bench. Robert Flowers, the panel's executive director, read a commission report describing public censure as "tantamount to denunciation."

Locally, members of the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance praised the decision.

"It's good that [Hampton's] decision has not gone unnoticed," said Beth, an LBGA member who wanted her last name withheld. "The outrage was rightfully deserved."

"I hope this is the beginning. It's important that [lesbians, bisexuals and gay men] get more understanding in the court system," ste said.

William Waybourn, president of the Dallas Gay Alliance, commended the rebuke and called for Hampton to step down.

"I believe that it's certainly a step in the right direction. But Judge Hampton remains on the bech. What is to happen now to gay men and lesbians who come into his courtroom?" Waybourn said.

The commission ruled that Hampton's statements to news reporters violated the Code of Judicial Conduct, which prohibits public comment on a pending case and requires judges to promote public confidence in the judiciary.

"I think that any judge in Texas would be on notice that certain kinds of language in the courtroom are going to be watched for concerns of open bias," said Peter d'Errico, a UMass professor of legal studies. "[Hampton's bias] was blatant when it happened, and this is an equally blatant and appropriate

No one injured after explosion

Bottle ruptures in Kennedy

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

A two-litre bottle containing dry ice exploded early yesterday morning after an individual, who police said probably realized the potential danger of the bottle exploding, placed it in a trash can. No one was injured as a result of the explosion.

Police responded to a call coming from the 19th floor of Kennedy Residence Hall, but arrived after the plastic bottle had split.

Edward Voigtman, a professor of chemistry at the University of Massachusetts, said dry ice, a solid carbon dioxide, will convert to gas in a closed container.

Increasing volume inside the container could force it to rupture, he said.

The primary danger of this explosion is a loud noise which could startle somebody, Voigtman said.

Police are investigating the incident.

ARRESTS

- Andrew R. Labrecque, 21, of Easthampton, was arrested for operating after suspension after being stopped for speeding and defective equipment on Commonwealth Avenue yesterday.

Lesters to lead 'special' religious service in song

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Julius and Carolyn Lester, a couple that share marriage and the Jewish religion, will lead a Shabbat service tonight scheduled to include a discussion of Hanukkah, the eight-day Feast of Lights that begins later this month.

"They have a particular style of services which are a blend of the innermost feelings of Judaism they are trying to conveey," said Gary Kabler, religious chairman of Hillel.

Carolyn Lester said her husband will lead most of the service, held at 7p.m. at the Hillel House on North Pleasant Street. He will also serve as the cantor, the person leading the congregation in song.

Toward the end of tonight's main service, she said is a sermon titled "Renewing the Gates." She calls it a "liturgical midrash," or religious commentary.

"It is my interpretation of Hanukkah. It is a revisioning of the eight days as eight days as a process of healing,"she said.

The husband and wife team want to "invite students to think about Hanukkah in a new way. I want to give them lots of time before Hanukkah,"she said.

Kabler, who has attended several of the couple's services, called "fun, a little different and enjoyable presentations."

"Their approach is much more musical and encompassing of the congregation at large," Kabler said. "It is easy to join in the songs even if one did not know the words," he said.

Carolyn Lester is a rabbinical student at the Academy for Jewish Religion in New York. She commutes to school for Monday and Tuesday of each week.

Julius Lester is a professor of Judaic Studies at the University of Massachusetts and is the author of many books; his latest is titled Lovesong; Becoming a Jew.

UMW rep hopes to find area support for strikers

Mine workers to enter 10th month of protest

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the Democratic Socialists of America has scheduled a trip to West Virginia for Martin Luther King weekend to show support for a mine workers strike against the Pittston Company.

The mine workers, who have been picketing and slowing production since April 5, are protesting Pittston's unfair labor practices and the company's failure to bargain legitimately, said Tim Baker, a representative from the United Mine Workers of America.

Baker, speaking to about 50 people Wednesday night at UMass, said he is traveling around New England attempting to convince labor unions to halt support to companies involved with Pittston.

He said the mine workers are demanding a reinstatement of health and insurance benefits to retired and disabled UMW members.

Baker said he has received strong support from local labor unions.

"Labor support has been terrific around here," Baker said."A lot of time, money and energy has been donated."

However, he was unsure of the amount of support the strikers are receiving nationally.

"Nationally I can't really speak, since I'm working locally," he said. "A lot of unions have a tendency to back off, labeling us 'too radical'. When you're fighting for your life you can't help but to be too radical."

He added, "What can [the police] do with a peaceful group? It scares the hell out of them."

Strikers have formallytrained in civil disobedience, and wear camouflage shirts and pants as their badge of solidarity, Baker said. He said strike actions against the company are undertaken peacefully.

"I'm not going to get a whole lot of mileage from telling you we're down there blowing up buildings and tearing people up," Baker said.

Baker said that after continuing to work without a contract for 14 months, the mine workers voted for a fromal work stoppage. Their first action was blocking the entrance of the central coal production locale.

"Over a two-month period, we were fined a total of $13 million," Baker said.

Remarkably, in a place that is normally so conservative and anti-union, the mine workers have received strong support from students and community members around the striking area. Baker explained that this is partially because mine workers lives depend on the union for fair wages and health benefits.

"People in Virginia live, breathe, and die union. There is two sides to the issue, either because you're on our side or theirs, there is nothing in the middle," he said.

On the other hand, police have not been so supportive of the mine workers' efforts.

"When we decided to change our plan of action and began trying to stop coal production by traveling slowly in front of the coal trucks, the police had an injunction created that changed the speed limit from 35 to 55," Baker explained."We were fined $5,000 a day for not stopping strike acts."

Children of intermarriages discuss problems in observing religions

By PAUL D'AGOSTINO
Collegian Staff

With Hanukkah and Christmas fast-approaching, children of intermarried parents may face difficulties in choosing which religious traditions to observe.

Micha Balf, a U.S. representative for Israel, spoke with several students and others about their experiences as children of intermarried parents.

Balf, who grew up in Massachusetts, related his experiences as the child of one Jewish and one Protestant parent.

He said he felt a lack of religious identity because he was not connected to a particular religion. As he grew older, he felt the need to become part of a whole community, he said.

After a trip to Israel and some "soul searching" he decided to commit fully to Judaism and move to Israel, he said.

Other people in the group spoke about their own experiences as either children of intermarriages or members of an intermarriage.

Among the issues raised during the discussion was that many times neither parent is a practicing member of their faith.

Some members of the group said that often parents claim religion is not an important issue in their marriage. But when they have children, religion suddenlyh becomes an issue as parents try to decide under what faith the child should be raised.

Balf said both Christians and Jews face the option of conversion to another religion. However, some participants said they have a strong connection to their religion and want to affirm their faith.

Jews in particular feel a cultural connection to Judaism, he said.

He said children growing up in a mixed marriage do not always understand the difference between Christianity and Judaism.

During holidays, families celebrate both Christmas and Hanukkah without really understanding either tradition, he said.

UMass senior Andy Blumenthal asked, "Is it necessary for a child to grow up with religion to become a morally and ethically good person?

The group answered that it was possible to become a morally correct person without being identified with a particular religion.

They said that the need to identify with a religion, be it Judaism or Christianity, comes from the need to be a part of a whole community.

response."

"It's about time stuff like that began to happen," he said, adding that the case, however, will probably not be reopened.

"Somebody might say since the decision is abusive and biased [it should be reopened]. But at the time it was a legal action," d'Errico sid, adding that although the state commission has since said the decision was biased "they still shouldn't change the decision."

Hampton's office said yesterday he would not comment.

In December 1988, Hampton said he sentenced Richard Lee Bednarski to 30 years in prison instead of life for the slaying of two men in a park because the victims were gay.

"[Hampton's] decision was ridiculous . . . an affront to human dignity," Beth said. "I'm glad someone did something about it."

sure of only two hepatitis viruses, type A and type B. Since many got hepatitis without exposure to these viruses, their disease was simply labeled non-A, non-B.

Last April, researchers from Chiron Corp. in Emeryville, California reported the discovery of a new hepatitis virus, which they hepatitis C. They said it is the principal culprit in non-A, non-B hepatitis. They also described a new test that will reveal whether blood is tainted with the virus.

Hepatitis C is the most common serious infection that is passed through blood. Perhaps 5 percent of all Americans who get routine transfusions become infected, although estimates vary widely. However, this hazard should largely disappear soon when the new screening test for the virus becomes available, perhaps sometime next year.

Most cases of hepatitis C are mild. About half of all those infected become long-term carriers, and 10 percent suffer cirrhosis of the liver.

The latest research, conducted on 207 people, shows that therapy with alpha interferon, a human protein produce through genetic engineering, can temporarily shut down the virus's attack.

concerned than technocrats and workers with human rights, he said, so the Third World must frame their struggle in terms of human rights.

"They must talk the language of rights," he said. "The human rights discourse means a lot to the intelligentsia."

Machala also said the United States' international role could change as the East-West conflict subsides.

"Can there be a role for the U.S. internationally if the evil empire ceases to exist?" he said. "We can become the remaining evil empire."

Increased involvement in the conflict in Central America, where the United States already plays an influential role, could isolate the United States from the rest of the world, he said.

Lester Mazor, director of Hampshire College's department of legal studies, said a new war could be beginning under the aegis of ending the Cold War.

"This could be a new chapter in ... preparation for the next 100 Year War between the North and the rest of the world," he said.

'World AIDS Day' starts today

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Today, in light of the 150,000 cases of AIDS that have been reported from more than 145 countries, many areas of the University of Massachusetts community are coming together for World AIDS Day.

The nationally recognized day was created by the World Health Organization's special program against AIDS to get people throughout the world to focus not only on AIDS, but also on education on AIDS, according to Heidi Klein, teaching assistant of the Peer Sexuality Group at UMass.

This nationally recognized day is being "celebrated" at UMass for the second year. Klein said although this time of the semester is a busy time, the approach the University is taking is a good one.

"It's effective because the University is not targeting one group," Klein said.

Nazeem Muhajarine, coordinator of the AIDS Research Colloquium, said the presentations cover subjects ranging from the HIV virus, AIDS in prisons, to the AIDS epidemic in Africa.

"This day is meant to make the people take a look at the urgency of AIDS and how we have to do something about it," Muhajarine said. "The WHO urges every nation, school, and community to do something. This is our part."

Various activities will be taking place today:

- The Massachusetts AIDS Resaerch Unit and School of Public Health will co-sponsor and AIDS Research Colloquium from 1:30p.m. to 5p.m. in the Lederle Graduate Research Tower room 1634.
- The University Gallery, located on the lower level of the Fine Arts Center, is observing "A Day Without Art: A National Day of Action and Mourning in Response to the AIDS Crisis." The exhibit will include portions of the NAMES Project Quilt. The gallery will be open today 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and Saturday and Sunday from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m.
- The "Not Ready For Bedtime Players" will present a program "Everything You Thought You Knew About Sex and More..." today at noon on the Student Union steps, weather permitting.

In the University setting, sex often takes place in conjunction with drug use. In fact, their effects on sexual performance are often cited as reasons to avoid drugs.

The question is: Just how do drugs affect sexual performance?

Alcohol is by far the most frequently used and most popular drug on college campuses. And, alcohol is frequently involved in sexual situations. Many people believe alcohol to be an aphrodisiac. Alcohol has a depressing effect on the brain's inhibitions -- emotions such as fear and guilt are stymied while under the influence.

The absence of these emotions often leave people freer to be sexual and thus, more "turned on." Alcohol provides an excuse for sexual behavior. Not feeling the responsibility inherent in sexual activity can lead to poor decision-making, pregnancy, STD transmission, date rape and hurt feelings, However, alcohol can reduce physical functioning as well. Men may experience erections sooner and take longer to ejaculate. Other men experience difficulty in becoming erect or suffer premature ejaculations.

As a result of the uninhibiting effects of alcohol, women may have an easier time relaxing and lubricating. For some women, the physical tension needed to reach orgasm may be impossible for their bodies to create, making orgasim difficult. Other women may experience orgasm sooner, more easily or more often while under the influence of alcohol.

Marijuana, commonly known as "Pot," affects sexual arousal in a similar way as alcohol. This drug also reduces inhibitions , easing the tension or awkwardness of sexual situations. Marijuana distorts one's perception of time and can thus lead a person to s/he experienced prolonged arousal or orgasm. There is no chemical basis to this belief. However, the placebo effect, the belief that a drug will produce a desired effect, is often the reason behind any truly heightened sexual experience while "stoned."

Amphetamines or "Uppers" energize the central nervous system and can elevate one's mood. This mood alteration can lead to a more positive perception of a situation or more confidence while in a sexual situation. Chronic use of uppers can lead to addiction, which in turn will lead to a decrease in sexual functioning. Amphetamines also can dry the body's mucus membranes, making lubrication for women difficult and making vaginal-penis intercourse painful.

Cocaine is often hailed as an aphrodisiac but there is no biological data to back this up. Frequent use of cocaine can lead to reduced vaginal lubrication, reduced erectile capabilities and a diminished libido.

Ask Us is a compiled effort by students in the "Peer Sexuality" class.

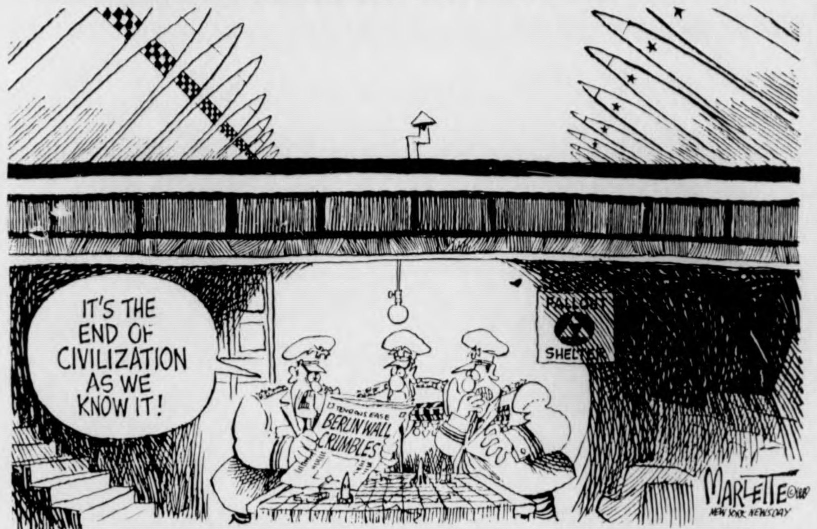
The Berlin Wall: A 'clean break' with the past?



Economics, prime concern in East Bloc

The opening of the border is important for the future of reform in East Germany in at least three regards. First, in a twist of irony, the lifting of travel restrictions allows people to stay, especially those with the determination, courage and skills to make up for forty lost years.

Henning Schulzrinne

In 1961, few could imagine that the wall and barbed-wire fences would last almost a generation. Now, any attempt to restrict travel would lead to mass exodus or uprising. One of the chants of the weekly Leipzig demonstrations is "We are staying;" however, freedom of travel leads a certain urgency to the push for reform. People are waiting with their suitcases packed.

It also offers a certain protection against a repeat of the events of June 17, 1953, when demonstrations with very similar demands were crushed all over East Germany, leaving between 300 and 400 dead. The third effect is economic: When people flow freely, so do goods and currency. It becomes impossible to maintain an official exchange rate of one-to-one when the black market trades at more like ten-to-one.

The most immediate concerns are economical. While the East German economy is modern by East bloc standards and certainly not as much a basket case as that of Poland, East Germans compare their standard of living to West Germany, not to their neighbors to the east. Given the right conditions, a second "economic miracle" is possible, however.

Only after democratic institutions are firmly in place, longer-range issues such as the relationship of the two Germanys can be addressed. Right now, East Germans have other priorities than worry about these long-range issues, realizing that a truly democratic East Germany and preferably an economically strengthened one, is the condition for any realignment of borders.

Chancellor Kohl has proposed on-going consultations on the highest level as a first practical step and (wisely) made any economic assistance conditional on democratic election. In gerneral, it seems as if American pundits have talked gloomily about the imminent rise of a new German Reich, while the response among German politicians and populace was far more cautious and realistic.

Many models and levels of a "special relationship" between East and West Germany are possible; an integration into the current federal system of West Germany provides only one of the possibilities. A close affiliation with West Germany would also provide a certain protection against political instability in the Soviet Union. What can the role of the United States be?

First, it should be recognized that the shape of Germany is first and foremost to be decided by Germans.

The United States, along with other countries, can and should voice its concerns, which West Germany will be well-advised to heed, if for no other reason than economic reasons. Budgetary constraints will force Washington to let West Germany take a leading role in economic assistance, as it is already doing in aid to Poland, outspending the United States by a factor of three.

In a world where trade surplus counts more than missile surplus, the United States can only resume a shaping role once its own economic house is in order. This is something stability and democracy in Europe can significantly contribute to through reduced defense burdens.

U.S. foriegn policy can encourage continued Soviet tolerance for democratic change by stressing the close link between this process and arms control, liberalization of trade restrictions and support for Soviet membership in international monetary organizations.

The opening of the Berlin Wall is an important, hopeful first step in a long journey to a truly democratic republic.

Most importantly, it attests to the power of the human spirit. Even forty years of indoctrination cannot subdue the yearning for basic freedoms.

Henning Schulzrinne is a UMass grad student

Seizing the moment of change

For almost three decades the Berlin Wall stood. Austere and forbidding, the Wall announced that the world was split. Two opposing socio-political systems, eternally alien and belligerent, had forced the Wall's construction.

Jay Allain

Accompanying it was what British peace activist Mary Kaldor termed "imaginary war," the institutionalization of the Cold War which conditioned us all to adjust to the unthinkable – the complete annihilation of the planet through nuclear exchange.

The money that the United States alone has spent on preparations for this apocalypse are equal to the cost of everything in the country except the land. By rendering the Wall as irrelevant then, the world faces potentially a new era of peaceful coexistence and the freeing up of massive sums of money for life-enhancing pursuits.

But can this happen? Might the Wall's demise truly usher in a much deferred epoch of universal understanding, a time when swords will be beat into ploughshares? Perhaps.

A key to this new opening rests in the will of the citizens of this country. For above all else, the Cold War has been a way of seeing, an airtight world view which, despite its horrific nature, has become an addiction.

More concretely, who will we hate now that the East Bloc has lowered its Iron Curtain? Or must we even hate? And what of the millions of U.S. citizens whose livelihoods are dependent on producing and maintaining weapons of war? Shall they now insist that their companies develop economic conversion strategies so that civilian goods might be produced rather than weapons?

Or will the addiction to affluence prevent all but a courageous minority from forsaking lucrative careers in defense for lower paying necessary jobs in health and education and ecology? While 30,000 jobs in the military sector might be converted to close to 100,000 jobs in the human sector, it is hardly a given that the American people will insist on this re-prioritization. For currently money is our idol.

If the citizens of this country seize on the new moment that the passing of the Wall provides, then the planet's chances would receive their greatest boost in memory. Rulers of both the East and the West should be pressured so that concrete agreements can occupy the new vacuum created recently.

Areas such as environment, commerce, space exploration and educational/cultural exchanges – as well as much needed military reductions – could provide the living bridges that establish a harmonious post-Wall world. With the stress and economic debacle of the Cold War alleviated, both blocs could move to address the real needs of their peoples. The Third World, the silent and long-suffering partner, could benefit as well.

If the United States and the Soviet Union cease to perceive themselves as glorious empires with missions to dominate whatever the cost. Then all people might finally achieve a life worthy of living.

NOTE: The author is an area activist and graduate of UMass in 1973. He is currently banned from campus because of his involvement in the spring sit-ins organized by the People for a Socially Responsibile University (PRSU).

Jay Allain is a Northampton resident

Breaking down symbols

Tearing down the Berlin Wall is an extremely important symbolic gesture. For years it has been the hallmark of the eastern bloc and its authoritarian policies. This is a sure sign that irrepressible, revolutionary change is at hand.

People all over the world are risking their lives to fight for freedom. They need this kind of symbolic victory to nourish their efforts. It encourages freedom fighters, everywhere, to keep the faith and increases worldwide awareness and concern.

John Patrick Musulin

Americans, perhaps more than anyone else, know the importance of symbolism and media coverage. Ask anyone about the 1988 presidential campaign and the only things people will remember are "Willie Horton," "Read my lips, no taxes" and "card-carrying liberal."

The media coverage of the Berlin Wall will accelerate the global trend toward establishing democratic electoral processes and basic human rights.

Watching the happy faces of the East Germans, as they passed freely across the Wall into the west was an inspirational experience that I could never forget. It will forever be etched in the annals of history.

This is the same Berlin Wall that only decades ago brought the world to the edge of their seats, in fear. It focused the collective, volatile energies of the East-West struggle onto one town and nearly erupted into a global disaster. It's removal is increasing communication and travel opportunities for the people in Eastern Europe and setting the stage for progressive change.

As the lines of communication between the East and West open up, they will realize that they are not alone. The masses will realize their strength in numbers and organize to re-establish free elections, the right to vote and basic human rights.

Eliminating the Berlin Wall will bust the authoritarian dam and release the tidal wave of free will. It is human nature to want to be free and independent. Once aroused, the forces of human nature cannot be defeated.

There are symbolic Berlin Walls in every corner of the globe and everyday the battle to tear them down must continue.

In South Africa, the Apartheid Wall is straining at the seams to deny basic freedoms to the black majority. It is one of the last strongholds of blatant racism and discrimination.

In Latin America, the Cocaine Wall daily snuffs out freedom, human rights and free elections. How can these people have any hope against druglords with state-of-the-art weapons and bottomless bankroles?

In China, the Great Wall trembles as the people become martyrs for Democracy. They shed their blood in the hope that their families and friends may someday enjoy the freedoms that they now can only dream of.

In the Middle East and Northern Ireland, the Religious Wall propagates senseless violence and prevents the peaceful co-existence of more than one manner of worship.

Here in our own country, an economic wall separates peripheral groups from the mainstream, relegating them to day-to-day sustenance and preventing them from enjoying the luxuries that many of us take for granted. At this university, a financial wall may restrict many from returning to continue their education.

Hopefully, all of these symbolic walls may fall in the same way that the Berlin Wall has. The struggle for freedom, equality and justice will never end. We must enjoy each victory while we can so that we might have the inspiration to continue fighting.

Pro-choice comedy: A womb with a view

By LISA MILLIGAN
Collegian Correspondent

The bashful and the reserved should be wary of attending Sleeveless Theater's production of "Womb for Rent" in Hampden Theater. Through stinging satire and vaudivillian song and dance, this troupe of five women boldly confront nearly every issue concerning the pro-life/pro-choice debate.

Billed as a "Pro-Choice Comedy," the production consists of 13 skits ranging in titles from "Sperm/Egg Wrestling" (a mock depicting fertilization through an Olympic style wrestling match), to the "Tug-o-Woman Contest" (symbolic representation of the forces that influence a woman in her choice concerning abortion).

In addition to entertaining, Sleeveless Theater seeks to inform through such skits as "The History of Abortion and Birth Control, Parts I, II and III. The skit consists of one woman delivering a serious narration while three others perform pantomime behind her. Each of the actresses perform their parts with confidence and wit, and the jokes are well received.

Lisa Channer, K.D. Halpin, Maureen Futtnen, Terrianne Falcone and Kate Nugent (the writers and performers of the play), should be lauded for making "Womb for Rent" more than just a recitation of jokes. In "Webster," the actresses stage a scene in the style of the train scene in The Music Man, as four Supreme Court Justices debate the Webster case (the recent case that made abortion legality a state decision) to a rhythmic beat.

In "Things I've Really Seen," each actress reads a quote from a public figure concerning the abortion issue.

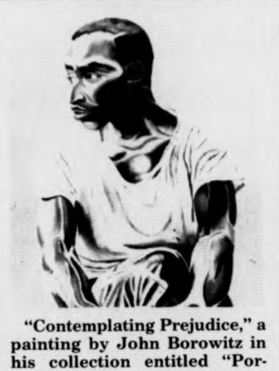
Unfortunately "The Pro-Lifer Profile" shows the troupe performing caricatures of the stereotypical pro-life activist. Characters are described as pro-NRA (National Rifle Association), pro-Stealth Bomber and pro-Star Wars, in addition to being pro-life, thus offering the faulty assumption that the average pro-lifer can be lumped with all red-necked right-wingers.

Also in the skit, another character claims she's pro-life because she "Realizes that men are superior to women, and that's the way things should be." Once again, they fail to note that that many women who back the pro-life position are not trying to perpetuate a male-dominated society.

From a strictly entertainment standpoint, however, the production is well written and acted. The show keeps the audience's interest throughout its two hour length with its innovative variety of skits. The show is worth seeing whether one agrees with its pro-choice stance or not. A final performance is tonight at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theater. Tickets run on a sliding scale from $5 to $7.

The The stuff

Dangling the bone of the possibility of a The The concert last month, and then snatching it away from the salivating mouths of a hungry Amherst public, was one of the crueler tricks fate has played upon us of late. The apparent cancellation was unavoidable due to a personal tragedy that befell (what should be) the voice of a generation, Matt Johnson. I am, however, the tider of kinder news. The The will play UMass, as soon as Monday Feb. 5th. It will be the first show of 1990 that the UPC will be putting on, and the concert, featuring no opening act, will be held in the Student Union Ballroom. Tickets for the upcoming show will be available soon: $7 for UMass students, $10 for the general public. They are available at Tix Unlimited, For the Record, Faces and Main St. Records. Rejoice. If you already bought tickets for the last scheduled show, then you should contact the Fine Arts Center about getting a refund or some kind of credit. Those tickets will not be honored at the new show. And don't forget the newly released (in the States) video album "Infected." $20 & brill.



"Contemplating Prejudice," a painting by John Borowitz in his collection entitled "Portraits of Oppression and Resistance" is currently on show at the Wheeler Gallery until Dec. 10

UVC goes on a Fun Quest

The folks at Union Video Council have done it again.

For the second time in two days, UVC premieres a new creation, as it shows the Marija L. Boily and Emil "Ace" Williams produced "Fun Quest" at 11:30 a.m. today.

"The show says how the average Joe Schmo can have fun at UMass," said Boily. "We feature local bands, and let the people know what the town of Amherst has to offer as far as fun activities."

The show, which originally started as a film program, but was broadened to encompass all entertainment, features the bands Rumrunners and The Bottom Line, frozen yougert parlor, Bananarama, and other subjects on its first program.

Still in its evolving stages, the half-hour show mixes its reviews with off-beat, satirical narratives. People in the ten person crew all play roles in acting, camerawork, editing and other activities involved.

In addition to serving as a production consultant for the program, Boily, a junior, BDIC film major, is the cable coordinator for UVC.

"I set up the schedules for the 25 hours of programming a week," she said.

UVC has televisions throughout the Campus Center and Student Union for people to view their programs.

"We want to explore the means of video production and try to get new and innovative student programming out to the students so they can see all we offer here at UVC," Boily said.

In addition to "Fun Quest" and the recently premiered "Avant Garage,"(a program of original art and comedy), UVC will soon debut its new news program. They hope to broadcast "Fun Quest" regularly next semester.

Of boats and barks and bowls of cherries

By JOHN DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Every once in a while patience pays off. Witness this week's surprise find: the album "Still Life" by the band Beautiful Pea Green Boat. With prior exposure to this group consisting of nothing more than two tracks on an import compilation ("Une Saison En Enfer," Third Mind Records), we still knew that this was a band to follow. The ethereal pulse of "Hammers of Islam" spoke volumes to us, and a search ensued to find more by this group. However, we were thwarted by the fact that this band signed to a foreign label with extremely limited distribution. Fruitless journeys to the record shops invited nothing but exasperation. Then, suddenly, out of the blue, a CD turned up on a domestic label (C'est La Mort) for a bargain price! We snagged it, raced home, and plunked the thing in. The powerful strains of "The Powerhouse" wafted out. All muscular bass and nervous percussion twitters, married to Heather Wright's airy harmonies, it conveyed an atmosphere of desperation. The refrain "I am the powerhouse" seemed to be a statement of defiance, with the synth horns blaring out "do your worse" to all comers. "Heady stuff, this," we thought and skipped ahead a few articles.

DISC JUNKIE

It isn't all a bowl of cherries. "Among The Ruins" is a bit overcooked. The lyrics, while not terrible, smack a bit of high school histrionics. The word that comes to mind for the track is "overwrought." But the sublime thrills of "When Dreams Moved In" more than makes up for it. Opening with a sadly cheap sounding piano imitation, it bursts into the kind of doomy yet uplifting atmosphere you might get if you married Kate Bush with Depeche Mode, Propeganda and Cocteau Twins. "Paper House" is similarly wonderful, a plaintive four-note piano motif echoing starkly against hugely expansive drums. Heather's voice takes off into another galaxy with some intriguing counterpoint lines, and lyrics that might have been nicked from a David Sylvian album.

You can tell we really get off on this group, can't you? We hereby nominate Heather and her partner Ian Williams for sainthood in the Junkie corpus. Adventurous, atmospheric, and largely successful, this record oozes promise. Once again, we say: ignore it at your own peril.

We now turn from the beautiful to the fascinatingly ugly. The album "Rabies" is the posthumous death rattle of Canadian noise terrorists Skinny Puppy. Formed in 1983, the group has centered around synthesist and rhythmatist Cevin Key, and vocal torturer Nivek Ogre. The formula has altered little from their first EP: a monstrous beat, dark synth textures, and Ogre's voice run through enough effects to choke an army. One of our friends has called them 'Devo with throat cancer."

However, you care to classify it, they are now no longer a band. Fortunately for history, "Rabies" is as fine an album as they've ever produced. On the opening track, "Rodent", the powerful beats and the military precise synth bleeps are teamed up with a sound new to the Puppy attack: the distorted guitar crunch of main-Ministry-man Alien Jourgensen. There was fear among Puppy aficianados that Jourgensen would turn the band into yet another Ministry offshoot, but fear not, they survive his intrusion with minimal damage. The one song where he manages to interfere a bit too much is "Fascist Jock Itch" which bears more of his stamp than is comfortable.

Elsewhere, it's business as usual with some noticeable improvements over last years album "Vivisectvi." For one thing, they've switched off most of the distortion boxes, except on Ogre's voice, of course. This lets the excellent musical parts come through much better. Second, there are two beautiful, mainly instrumental, pieces: "Rivers" and "Choralone" feature only samples from movies and television for vocal accompaniment. The current single, "Tin Omen" has some brilliant stop/starts and tempo shifts, and a chilling vocal challenge: "Ha ha ha! The Joke is on you!" While taking a look at the 60's nostalgia trend, it pours alcohol on such wounds as the Kent State shooting and also spits bile on the current trend to turn political events into a media circus with the spoky refrain "Keep the camera alive!"

"Warlock" is an intriguing song, starring some powerful Jean-Michel Jarre-ish chord progressions, and a sample from The Beatle's "Helter Skelter" mixed with Charles Manson speaking the lyrics from that song. At the song's climax, it manages to sound sad rather than angry. It's somewhat startling for a band that has majored in one emotion for six years, but they've done it rather well here. Such a shame that just as they were showing signs of development they disbanded, but such is life. "Rabies" stands as a great testament to one of the quintessential 80's bands. May they rest in peace.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANNE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do not let others distract you with their petty disputes. Deal with difficult matters as they arise. Do not overanalyze someone's actions. A relationship can be salvaged.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Children need a sympathetic ear, not lectures. A bold approach will help you win a new job or contract. Sudden acceptance by a previously indifferent group should give you pause.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You should encounter friendliness wherever you go today. New financial gains or a job offer are possible. Early Christmas shoppers can find excellent bargains.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Confirm travel arrangements; a mistake could prove embarrassing as well as costly. Wealth does not guarantee success. A long-distance relationship may be frustrating but could prove worthwhile.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): By leaving a margin for error, you can save yourself considerable wear and tear. Take the time to do careful research. Long-distance communications will boost business or a romantic relationship.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not hurry a project. Quality, not speed, is what counts with an authority figure. Pay attention to your close friends; they truly want to help you. Loved ones need reassurance. Be appreciasive.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Play it cool with someone who does not understand your motives. Get expert advice before making a financial or career decision. Change your routine to prevent boredom.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your words become more powerful when followed by decisive action. Be very diplomatic when handling a challenge from a group of people who work behind the scenes. A community project is inspiring.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Others will trust you even more after you fulfill a promise. Your special gifts allow you to serve mankind in a way few people can match. You benefit from your efforts to help children.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your ingenuity helps you find a way around a financial limitation. Do not let your standards slip. Make things easy for a friend or relative who has to work overtime. Offer to baby-sit.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): When you accept new responsibilities, you boost your earning potential. A change of lifestyle will require the cooperation of your roommate or spouse. Do-it-yourself decorating saves money.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Several heads are better than one now. Key associates could have strengths you may lack. Follow your usual routine. You may have to appease a close ally if you want continued cooperation.

Senior Shana Smith took first place in the mile run with a time of 5:10.53, and freshman Maureen Meldrim came in behind her with a time of 5:34, placing second. Smith and Meldrim also ran the 800-meter for which they placed first (2:24.5) and fourth (2:36.7), respectively.

Obviously we're very pleased," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "It's a great way to open a season."

The New Hampshire Invitational is another non-scoring meet in which the harriers can practice and smooth out the edges. Schools competing will include New Hampshire, Salem State, Colby College and Worcester State.

On the track: 55-meter hurdles - Anderson and freshman Jen Piccioli; 55-meter dash - sophomore LeeAnn Ambrose, freshman Aleta Beyers, and junior Susan McFayden; 200-meter run - Ambrose, Beyers and McFayden; 400-meter - McFayden; 600-meter - freshmen Lennice Johnson, senior co-captain Julie Muccini, and freshman Dana Smith; 800-meter - Anderson; 1000-meter - freshman Becky Johnson; 1500-meter - sophomore Michelle St. Laurent; 3000-meter - junior Kathy Holt and senior Wendy Lofgren.

Competing in one of two 4 x 400-meter relays will be freshman Dana Smith, Muccini, L. Johnson and Ambrose in the first heat with B. Johnson, St. Laurent, McFayden and Beyers running in the second heat.

In field events: 20-pound weight - White and Castriotta; shot put - Castriotta and Anderson; high jump - Anderson; long jump - Anderson and Beyers; and triple jump - Piccioli, L. Johnson and freshman Christine Francoeur.

"Despite the absence of Smith, Meldrim and junior Laura LaVallee, we can come on strong at New Hampshire," said LaFreniere. "We may not have a large team, but we have a lot of quality athletes."

under them, and we'll have a loss to Lowell," Calipari said with disgust.

Calipari isn't counting out his team by any means. But there are a lot of kinks that have to be worked out.

That means a better performance from sophomore guard Jim McCoy, who was a dreadful 1-for-14 from the floor. Also, more aggressive play on the boards and better shooting from the free throw line.

Then there's sophomore guard Anton Brown. Calipari can only cross his fingers that Brown will have recovered a little more from an injured left knee that had a noticeable effect on him in the Lowell game.

"We're going to rest him this week in practice," Calipari said.

Senior guard Cary Herer had a good showing with eight assists, but Calipari needs him to push the ball more if they're going to be successful. UMass never got its running game going in the opener, which caused all kinds of problems, particularly with the three-point game.

"We shoot our three-pointers off the fast break, and we've got to get off about 15 a game," Calipari said. "We only got six [against Lowell], and the two that we got in [Tony Barbee and Rafer Giles] were in transition."

Getting the treys would be a start, but the Minutemen will have to improve on a lot more than that if it entertains any hopes of evening its season record tomorrow.

women's basketball

"They're (Hartford) a pretty darn good team," said UMass coach Kathy Hewelt. "They have a good recruiting class and they're always a very physical team."

As for her own team, Hewelt is still trying to get them to flow both offensively and defensively. After two games the Minutewomen are averaging 59 points while allowing oppenents 72. In Wednesday night's loss to BU, UMass only attempted 39 shots, compared to 69 for the Terriers.

"The turnovers (24) hurt the number of shot opportunities for us," said Hewelt. "We tried to regroup after (breaking) the press and we were delaying to long. We need to keep attacking. We should be able to flow more smoothly.

"And because we didn't block out well BU got a lot of second and third shots. So we were getting one shot while they were getting three."

While the cold shooting (4-21) of guards Michele Pytko and Patty Robak can be chalked up to 'it was just one of those nights,' the phenomena of Sue Serafini only attempting two shots must be explored.

"Sue needs to adjust," she said. "She had the ball in her hands a lot, but she chose not to shoot it. Everyone knows she's a scorer so defenses are playing her tough, but she needs to shoot."

Defensively the coaching staff was pleased with the effort defensively of the reserves but not the starting five. Hewelt promises that will change immediately.

"We're frustrated on offense and it's carrying over to the defense," she said. "When we don't have the ball we're not thinking defense. Offensively UMass must prove it can handle pressure defenses like it has seen its first two games because teams will keep pressing until otherwise. "We need to be emotionally prepared to face pressure defense," said Hewelt. "Teams are making us play a half step faster and we're not used to it."
